THE CAPE YORK KILLER

Murray knew he'd been asleep on his boat when somebody shot the old man. But all the evidence pointed the other way.

FICTION / JOHN P. GILDERS

MURRAY STEPPED lightly from his fishing boat on to the scoured jotty at Point Walter. He tested the ropes. "Emerald" had not moved during the night and was secure. He looked towards the town.

Strange, he thought. There's nobody around.

Murray frowned. He had pulled into Point Walter for steaks. Walcha, his aboriginal deck hand, was sound asleep in his bunk below. The sun was high now and steam rose from the mangroves along the river bank.

Murray licked his dry lips. Dooley's pub must be open. He felt inside the pocket of his jeans, and wondered if he could afford a beer.

It was only 10 am, but the brightness of the day made Murray screw up his eyes. Point Walter had one pub, one general store and a dozen ancient iron and weatherboard houses scattered around it was hardly a town at all — just a stopping place for fishing boats operating along Cape York Peninsula.

Murray walked up the wooden steps on to the veranda of Dooley's pub. He pushed open the swing doors. The bar was empty.

"Anybody here?" Murray called. There was no answer. Murray rubbed his dry lips. Usually there were always a few men in the bar. Point Walter had been a prosperous tin mining town once, but now it was mainly populated by old age pensioners. The old men could always be found playing draughts at the designated tables.

Murray frowned. The place was like a morgue. Not a sound anywhere. He walked back outside on to the veranda.

He brought out a leather pouch and rolled a cigarette. The paper fluttered from his lips as his gray eyes searched the town.

The North Queensland sun beat down, and heat waves shimmered across the dry, dusty road. The few houses nearby seemed strangely empty. A dog barked somewhere, but that was all.

Suddenly, Murray saw a man come out of Brennan's General Store about 200 yards away.

The man saw Murray, pointed and yelled. Brennan's Store came to life. A dozen men rushed out into the street. They all surged towards Murray, their faces grim. Bush Hayes ran into his house and came out with a rifle. He ran towards the hotel, the other men following.

"We got you just in time!" Bush Hayes pointed. He pointed the rifle at Murray. "What were you going to do? Rob the pub too?"

Murray blinked. "What are you talking about?"

Hayes held the rifle tight, his fat face glimmering with sweat. "We know you killed old Brennan!"

"What?" Murray exclaimed.

"Old Brennan has been shot," another man said.

Murray stared at the man. "I don't believe it!" he blurted out.

"You believe it all right," Dooley, the publican, said coldly. "Come on We'll get back to the store."

Murray walked quickly down the road, Bush Hayes pointing the rifle at his back. He entered the store and blinked. It was dark and cool inside. It took some time for his eyes to adjust. All kinds of merchandise cluttered the floor — buckets, brooms, fishing nets, haws, cans of paint, tools — old Brennan was the careless type. Cobwebs hung from the rafters above.

Kern Brennan sat weeping at a corner, old Mrs. Huddler comforting her.

Murray walked up to the long counter and looked behind. Brennan lay sprawled in a pool of blood, a gaping hole in his chest.

Bush Hayes edged forward. "Shot with his own rifle," he said coldly. "That was smart, Murray."

"I didn't do it!" Murray rasped. "You lay off me, Hayes! I've only been in town a few minutes!"

"Your boat came in late last night," Hayes accused. "You could have been here any time early this morning."

"What would I want to kill Brennan for?" Murray hit out. "He was a friend of mine. I've known him for years. Ask Kern."

The man looked at Kern. She was a pretty, dark-haired girl of 23 with luminous brown eyes. Now they were red with tears. She wore paint and a man's red and white checked shirt which was tight across her breasts. She swallowed and looked up.

"Yes," she said in a low voice. "Murray got on well with Dad. He wouldn't do anything like this."

"Huh!" Bush Hayes scoffed.

"Did you hear the shot, Karen?" Murray asked.

"No... I slept at Mrs Hadder's place last night."

"Did anybody hear the shot?"

The men looked at each other and slowly shook their heads.

"It must have happened during the night," Murray said. "Everybody must have been asleep. I was on board my boat."

Bush Hayes walked behind the counter and searched through Brennan's pockets.

"What do you think you're doing, Hayes?" Murray growled. "You aren't the police."

Hayes looked up angrily. "It'll take days to get a message to Coontown. There's no police here."

He pulled a battered wallet from the dead man's pocket. He examined the contents.

"You must have missed this when you killed the old man!" Hayes said triumphantly. He held a cheque in his hand.

Murray stared at it grimly.

"Insufficient funds," Hayes gloated. "That's what's stamped on your cheque, Murray. The last time you were here you paid the old man with a rubber cheque."

Hayes handed the cheque to one of the men. The man took it, passed it around. The crowd muttered in agreement.

"Old Brennan wouldn't like that, Murray. You chiselled him out of over $400. The way I see it, you came here last night for more stoves, had an argument with Brennan over the cheque, and because he wouldn't give you any more credit, you shot him dead."

"Oh! Looks like my husband is on a scratch-and-destroy mission?"

Murray backed away. "The cheque shouldn't have bounced," he said. "Brennan must have presented it too soon."

"Huh?" Hayes scoffed.

Hayes opened the cash register. "Empty," he said. "How much did you get, Murray?"

"I didn't get anything!" Murray cried. "I was asleep on board my boat all night!"

Hayes looked at some papers on the counter next to the cash register. He flipped through them.

"Hallo! What's this?" he exclaimed. He held up a list. His dark eyes burned. "Your name's on top of this order, Murray. Is this your handwriting?"

Murray looked at it. "Yeah," he said. "I gave that list to Brennan the last time I was here. It's an old order."

"Like hell it is!" Hayes growled. He examined it closely. "The ink is too fresh. This was written recently. This is the order you came with last night!"

Murray glared at Hayes. "You're full of smart ideas, aren't you, Hayes? Who do you think you are? A bloody detective?"

Hayes held up the list, looked at the men for support. They all nodded in agreement. All eyes turned accusingly towards Murray.

"He done it all right," Dooley said. He wiped sweat from his brow.

"That's right!" Hayes put in. "It had to be an outsider. Murray here is just a drifter. He only sells in every couple of months or so."

Angry words were tossed on all sides. The men pressed forward towards Murray, their faces grim.

"You murdering bastard!" Dooley

Savage fighters of the bush

MOST BUSH CREATURES are timid and peace when threatened, but the kangaroo cat and the red-tail cat will both show fight if cornered.

The kangaroo cat lives in tassels of grass on grassy flats and digs for grubs and worms for a living. But sometimes it goes to vegetation and attacks possums and other nocturnal creatures.

When disturbed by dogs, the 'red cat bolts off to the nearest hollow log from which it paws its distance at the dogs outside. When small dogs, like fox terriers, crowd in after it they are smashed with teeth and claws.

But nothing is more hated by a dog than a native cat. Curriers become thoroughly annoyed by its meows springing and scowling and will almost tear a building to pieces to get at it.

One man found a native cat high up in an orange tree one morning. One of his dogs was up in the fork of the tree and a black snorter dog was standing on its back, trying valiantly to reach the quarry.

They were probably lucky they could not reach it, however. Its sharp teeth and claws might well have proved a match for them.

spat out "Brennan was my best friend!"

Murray looked around desperately. The hostile crowd would beat him to a pulp. He backed away behind the counter.

"Get him!" Hayes shouted.

Murray jumped back. The crowd surged forward. Murray knew he could expect no help from anybody in Point Walker. The town was isolated, had no direct contact with the outside world.

Murray saw his chance as they parted one another. He punched Hayes on the jaw and snatched at the rifle. Hayes tried to jerk it out of the way, but he was too late. Murray got possession and pulled the trigger. There was an explosion, loud in the room, and the bullet tore through the roof. Acid gun smoke filled the store. The surging crowd stopped dead in their tracks.

Murray pointed the rifle at them. "Okay!" he grinned. "That's enough!"

There was absolute silence. The men stared at him, but backed away, afraid.

"I didn't kill Brennan?" Murray shouted. "And I'm not going to get beaten up for nothing! I'm leaving now, and if any of you idiots try to stop me I'll drop you for sure!"

Murray waved the rifle. The men parted, moved aside as he walked towards them. Murray backed carefully towards the door.

He stepped out into the bright sunlight. He fired one more shot into the air and ran quickly down the dusty road.

"Walcha! Walcha!" Murray shouted as he jumped on board "Emeralda."

There was movement from below. Murray cut off the ropes quickly. He looked back towards the town. The men had gathered in the streets, each now armed with a rifle.

"Walcha!" Murray yelled. "What are you doing, for Christ's sake?"

The Aboriginal stumbled up on deck, bleary-eyed. He blinked, shook his head and grinned. He put up one hand to wave off the men.

"Where the hell have you been?" Murray shouted.

"Been sleeping," Walcha replied sourly. "What's the matter?"

"Get the bloody motor going!"

Walcha walked into the wheelhouse. The motor whined and the dead motor turned over. Murray ran forward.

"Give her all she's got!" he cried.

Walcha blinked, and opened the throttle wide. The fishing boat surged away from the jetty.

"What's the hurry?" Walcha shouted.

"Look back there!"

Walcha turned and looked back towards the town. His face turned a dirty grey.

"Christ!" he said. He stared at the armed men running down the road towards the jetty. "What happened?"

Murray came into the wheelhouse. "Old Brennan was murdered," he said. "They think I did it!"

Walcha blinked, purred his thick lips. He looked at Murray, black eyes serious.

"You wouldn't kill anybody, boss," he said.

"Thanks," Murray said unnecessarily. "The trouble is the whole town thinks otherwise."

Murray took the wheel. He looked back anxiously. "Banerilda" was in midstream now, well down the river, but the man had raced out on to the jetty.

A rifle cracked. The bullet hit the iron railing up in the bow and ricocheted off with a long-drawn-out whine.

"That was close!" Murray cried. Walcha crouched low. Another bullet screamed overhead. Murray ducked down behind the wheel, holding it with his left hand.

A bullet shattered the glass overhead. Bits of broken glass flew everywhere. Murray held on to the wheel grimly as a hailstorm of shots echoed from the jetty. Bullets thudded into the side of the wheelhouse, and the remaining glass father. I thought if I came away with you on your boat the whole town would know that I bid faith in you. I didn't expect all this shooting though. What did you do?"

Murray told her Kern looked across.

"What are you going to do?"

"Go back to Cocktown and report what happened."

Kern nodded. "I guess it's the only thing to do," she said.

Murray stared at her. A new thought jumped into his mind.

"Christ!" he said harshly.

"What's the matter, boss?"

Walcha asked.

"They'll think we kidnapped her!"

"They'll think we dragged her on board as a hostage! Jesus Christ!"

"I'll let them see me jump overboard and swim for the shore!"

"Yeah?" Murray said ironically.

"How about them?"

He pointed to the mud flat land with dark green mangroves. Long, stony grey shapes lay basking in the sun. One swished its long tail and withdrew into the water.

"Oh!" Kern breathed. She stared at the crocodiles silently.

"If anything happens to this boat we're all done for," Murray said grimly.

Walcha shuddered. "Crocodiles no good, Boss," he said. He turned and walked quickly below.

An half hour later "Banerilda" approached the Point. Cars were lined up on the headland. Men stood next to them, rifles in hand, waiting.

"Get below!" Murray ordered. Kern ran down the steps to the cabin. A few seconds later she came running back up again, face flushed.

"Walcha's drunk!" she cried. "He's got your rifle and he's waving like a madman. He said he'd kill all of them."

"Christ!" Murray gasped. He pulled Kern inside the wheelhouse, his grey eyes hard.

"Steer the boat!" he ordered. "I'll go and talk to him."

Suddenly the aboriginal ran up on deck, whisky bottle in one hand, rifle in the other. His black eyes were dilated. Beads of sweat glistened on his brow.

He glared at the headland and the row of parked vehicles.

"Bastards!" he yelled. "You think you've got us. I'll show you something!"

He hurled the empty whisky bottle into the river. Then he lifted the rifle to his shoulder and pulled the trigger.

The rifle spat flame and men rushed for shelter behind the parked cars.

Walcha laughed triumphantly and fired again and again.

"Stop it!" Murray yelled. "You'll only make things worse!"

He tried to leave the wheelhouse but Kern pulled him back. "Don't touch him!" she cried. "He's crazy, he's drunk a whole bottle of whisky!"

Murray struggled with Walcha, grabbed her by the shoulder and pushed her away.

The men on the headland were returning the fire. Rifles cracked and bullets swept the deck. Walcha screamed with pain as a bullet hit him in the chest.

He staggered, shook his fist at the headland. "Bastards!" he yelled.

Native birds were pest-eaters

LANDHOLDERS NOWADAYS must put up with increased visitations of insect pests because of the ill-considered killing of native birds in the past.

For instance, one of the best destroyers of grasshoppers was the glaucous turkey, named "bustard" by Captain Cook back in 1770.

It has been ruthlessly exterminated by pest hunters and today many people have never seen one.

Hookworms have also been severely reduced in number by New Australians who regard them as "pigeons" and shoot for the table.

No longer do they appear in vast flocks as in the past, and the spear-winged plovers, though it still roams the cattle paddocks, is now scarce compared with its numbers in the early days.

disintegrated.

Walcha yelled with fear. He jumped up and ran down the steps to the cabin below. Murray gripped his teeth and tried to steer the boat.

Suddenly, the firing stopped. There was an empty silence.

Murray rose cautiously, looked towards the jetty. The men pointed and waved and shouted at the boat. Murray turned his head and gasped with surprise.

Kern Brennan stood on the forward deck, her just-died figure stiff, rigid. Walcha stood next to her looking embarrassed. Kern stared back at the jetty and waved.

The men waved back. The boat was too far away now for voices to carry.

"What are you doing here?" Murray shouted.

Kern turned and walked towards the wheelhouse, brown eyes sincere.

"I didn't like them accusing you in the moon," she said. "Nobody noticed, but I left early and ran all the way to the jetty."

"Why?" Murray growled. He stared at the soft swell of her breasts against the check shirt. He had never had a woman on board "Banerilda" before.

"I don't believe you killed my Kern looked startled. "I'll tell them it was all my idea," she said. "You don't have to worry."

"Don't have to worry?" Murray growled. "Just look behind you!"

Kern turned and looked back towards the jetty and the town. Dust was rising in a long cloud behind a line of cars and trucks. Their engines made a hum drone in the distance as they headed out along the rutted track.

"What's going on?" Walcha asked anxiously.

"They're making for the Point," Murray said grimly. "When the men run into the sea. You know how narrow that is!"

"Yeah," Walcha breathed, dark eyes wide with fear.

"They'll be close enough to pick us off. Especially me at the wheelhouse."

"Yeah."

Kern clutched at Murray's arm. "I hope it's not my fault," she said fervently.

"They're trying to save you!" Murray gritted. "That'll make the bastards more dangerous!"

Kern stared at him, brown eyes upstared.

VENGEANCE

IN THE SWAMP

Ferris had been roped in to track down the huge jail-breaker and his accomplices in any case. But when they raped his girl, that made it a personal thing . . .

FACT / ROLAND EMPEY

FERRIS WAS IN BED with Karen Roberts when the phone rang.

"Let it ring," the girl said. "That's just Hornyky down at the Gentry Spoon wanting me to work tonight. I don't want to work tonight."

"It might be for me," Ferris said. He picked up the phone.

"That you, Dave? It's Morrison here," the caller said.

"You're interrupting the hymn singing."

"Stop clowning," Morrison said impatiently. "Styka escaped and made it into the swamp. I'm going to have to go out after him and that means you're going to have to do some tracking for me."

Like Morrison was the chief law officer for that unmapped section of the South-eastern United States which included the two-million-acre Great Indian Swamp and the Vaneville Prison Farm. Most of the Vaneville inmates were men from the states that encircled the swamp. They were whites, blacks, Indians, over 90 percent of them convicted of some act of violence, usually rape or manslaughter.

Vaneville had too many break-outs, and the escapees always plunged into the swamp. They knew they had a good chance of getting lost, getting snake-bitten, or going down for eternity in quicksand, but there was that chance they'd get through.

Morrison had to pursue these men, but wasn't much of a woodsman. When he had someone important to go after (which meant an escapee convicted of murder), he usually called on Dave Ferris, a professional guide, to help him out.

Hiram "King Kong" Styka, the new escapee, was one of a few men at Vaneville from another part of the country built like an ox, Styles had been a partner for an East Harlem-based narcotics organization. He had been sent down to Mammoth an assignment but messed it up. His victim, only wounded, identified him and the subsequent police chase sent Styles racing northwest in a rented car.

By the time he reached the Great Indian Swamp, he had changed cars six times and killed four people. It took Ferra two days to locate him in a cave. Morrison and his deputies flushed him out with snakes from a bonfire they set at the mouth of the cave. And he came out shooting and screaming before the four men beat him flat."

"They're out of my jurisdiction already," Morrison said. "Then car's been sent up above the swamp and still heading north."

"Then what's your problem? They're in somebody else's territory."

"Yeah, but Styles ain't with them any more," Morrison said. "They must have dropped Styles off in the swamp somewhere."

"Why would they do that?"

"Well, my guess is they wanted him out of prison, but they couldn't take the chance of bringing him back home yet," Morrison said. "It's a 1000-acre haul and a horse like this here before," he said, leading Ferra and Morrison to the bunkhouse, the small of whisky heavy on his breath. "Basting in here and sewing machine-guns around. They scored the hell out of my boys. Worth till you see there."

They went into the bunkhouse. A hundred or so men were lying on cots, chained by the wrists and ankles.

"The way they were shooting and toasting around," Graves said, "after Styles escaped, we thought we better kind of hold them down." There were no sheets or blankets on the mattresses. The air smelled sour and stinky.

Ferra walked through the bunkhouse aware of the rifles, suspicious faces glowering up at him. All the men knew him some as the guide for summer tourists of the swamp, and others as the police tracker who had helped bring them in. He stopped beside a thin, grey-haired man of 40 with the unmistakable look of an Indian. This was Tommy Beant, whom he'd helped bring in eight years earlier.

"You were here when they took Styles out, Tommy?" Ferra asked.

"It ain't easy talking, Dave," the grey-haired man said calmly. "I'm sick. Graves panicked and had us down here for no damn reason and won't believe me that I'm sick."

"It's them that was in the prison, not me," Graves shouted. "Seeing all them guns scared the hell out of them. They could have taken the place apart if I took every guard we got here to get them tied down."

"Well, they're quiet enough now, so why don't you start turning them loose," Ferra said disgustedly. "You can start with Tommy here so I can have a talk with him."

Graves took a ring of keys out of his pocket and unlocked Beant, who sat up, rubbed his wrists.

A guard poked his head in the door and spoke to Morrison. "There's a phone call for you, Sir."

Morrison left the building and Ferra said, "All right, Tommy, what happened? I've got to go look for the son of a bitch and I want you to give me some kind of clue where he'd be heading."

"All right, there wasn't that much to it. We heard the car coming up and then there was shooting outside and we heard Pud Marby bellowing." Marby was the guard who had been killed. "The next thing we knew four of them come building in here, all of them wearing hats and suits and carrying submachine guns and telling us we'd be all right if we didn't get in their way." (Continued on page 66)

The war against white ants

IN AUSTRALIA'S FAR NORTH the white ants (termites) attack every growing thing, as well as wooden buildings and tools.

Down in Central Queensland they are not so bad and rarely attack green wood but they are very active in attacking timber houses.

A wood house is a dangerous thing to have in one's backyard — it serves as a home where the insects breed. Then they move to eat up the wood in the house itself.

Even worse is the maintenance job of empty fruit cases outside a green grove, because Mr Termites is mad about the taste of pear.

Large termite mounds are rare in the lower tropics. Most are small globular mounds, and they are quite impervious to the elements and to the rain ants. They are quite vulnerable to man, however. All he has to do is knock a small hole in the side of the mound, fill it with dry grass and twigs and apply a match.

Since the interior contains a lot of shovelled up woody material it takes fire readily and smoulders away to fine ash, exterminating the whole colony.

The old house would lift small mounds intact and take them home to be broken up in the food run. The ants inside made fine food for small chicks.

him to the ground, trussed him up like a rodeo bull, and dragged him off.

Styles was tried in the courthouse of a small town named Driscoll. Convicted of murder, rape, assault and car theft, he was sentenced to life at hard labor at the Vanville Prison Farm. He had served just four months when Ferra got under the phone call at Driscoll from the Morrison that he had escaped.

Ferra shouted on the phone, "What do you mean, he escaped? I'd have thought they were keeping him tied down with chains and padlocks."

"They were watching him close enough, Dave," Morrison said, "but they didn't figure on anybody busting him out. Four other heads down the big city broke into the bunkhouse after lights out. They killed a guard, got Styles and took off in a car."

"Which way were they heading?"

"Heading north."

"Well, that's going to get them out of your jurisdiction pretty fast, Styles wouldn't be too hard to spot. So I'm guessing he's supposed to hide out until they can figure a way to move him. Now, can you get over here? It ain't healthy with someone like that running around loose."

"All right, I'll be there," Ferra said, hanging up. He went back to Karen's bedroom.

"Now where are those damn pants of mine? Morrison needs me out at the Farm," he said.

The Vanville Prison Farm was 15 miles from Driscoll, and it took Ferra 40 minutes to reach it over those rutted dirt roads. Morrison was waiting for him along with Jed Graves, the Vanville superintendent. Morrison was big man, big as Ferra himself but thick through the chest and shoulders where the hard-faced guide was long-haired and rangy. The superintendent, Graves, was older than both of them by some 20 years. He was a stringy man with a drinker's blotchy face and the jumpy hands of a man on the edge of a breakdown.

I think that I will never see a girl more lovely in a tree, a girl who lounges through the day a girl who must love trees, because

Darling, what big ears you'll have...

Delicate, dainty, shell-like, or long, close-set — forget the face and figure, you can learn a lot more about a girl from her auditory apparatus.

FACT / PAUL BROCK

THE LADIES, bless 'em, because they are vain, insist on keeping it a secret. No matter how they cry, however, they can never fool the really observant male who delights in subjecting his favorite female playmates to the minutest possible scrutiny.

We refer to the shocking and sinister fact, confirmed by the world's foremost anatomists, that not one pair of female ears in the world is perfectly matched.

One ear is usually substantially larger than the other and is shaped differently. And here's the crowning blow — they are not placed exactly in the same position on each side of the female head.

This revelation suggests strongly that men who are on the point of being seduced into matrimony by the girl of their dreams ought to hold everything and take a much closer look at her ears.

Physiognomists (experts on facial contours) report enthusiastically that if the female ears are set well forward the girl is likely to be a hombody, interested exclusively in her man and her children, and always obedient to her revered lord and master.

But here's the rub about female ears — if they are set well back, the poor chap is likely to find that he is stuck with a ruggan, constantly yacking shrew, like millions of other luckless male who were never told just how to read a woman's character through her hearing apparatus.

The ear-set-well-back chick will ensure her man merely because he represents a permanent meat ticket plus spending money. She is a good-time girl who couldn't care less about her partner's rights, and will make his life miserable all death them do part.

At least that's what the physiognomists say when the ear-set-well-back chicks are safely out of hearing.

Some female ears tick too — literally — because they have what doctors call double objective tinnitus aurium ears. If you had them, there would be no amusement evident in your expression.

Each ear would tick regularly and audibly about twice a second. You would sound like a walking time bomb.

But men too develop ticking ears occasionally. A North Carolina advertising man had them, and he was 32-years-old before he realized that everybody else's ears were not keeping time with his own.

When his story got around, a radio and TV network put his ticking ears on a nationwide broadcast.

Several doctors proposed operating, but the patient turned them down. "I like my sporadic contractions," he said, "and I hope my snapping relationship tubes never get tired. I'd be lost without them."

Italian cosmologist Bruno Lombroso, who did a lifetime's study of the shape and position of male and female ears, taught that "deviant" or pointed ears, and those with no lobes, indicate nymphomaniac tendencies in women and promiscuous tendencies in men. Such ears, he said, belong to bigamists of both sexes, who find no trouble at all in fascinating a mate and coaxing him or her to bed.

The sex symbolism of ears is based on the fact that these organs represent both a projection from the body and an opening into it. Thus the ear as a symbol is bisexual, representing male and female genital organs, active and passive.

For centuries folklores has assessed moral prowess by the size, shape and position of the ears. Impugnation of the female by way of the ear is mentioned in many ancient legends as in the case of the sacred crocodik of Egypt, and the Buddha's mother, Maya. Early Christian writings and medieval art represent conception, with the male organ taking the form of a bird, through a virgin's ear. In some legends birth also takes place via the ear.

Ear-readers believe intellect is governed by the area of brain you have at the front of your head, and emotion by the area at the back. To get a good reading they measure how far away the ears are from the brainbox or emotional barometer.

They also believe that plenty of head height above the ears is a sign of imagination, idealism, and artistic leanings. Fastidious people, besides having their ears set well forward, also have them set fairly high on the head. The great lovers of history, it is claimed, all possessed these ear characteristics.

The shape and size of a woman's ears are claimed to be reliable guides to the eternal question of well the or won't she. If her ears are small or what's known as "shell-like", she won't — not without massive persuasion in the form of bribes, bribes and outrageous flattery.

Small shell-like ears belong to gals with selfish, intolerant and play-hungry faces. "Sign on the dotted line first" is the cold unfeeling message those auditory masterpieces would convey if they could talk as well as hear.

Ears with lobes that are red and strong, belong to warm, sexy, affectionate females interested in both equality and total togetherness of the sexes. Red lobes usually go with generous loving lips and disarmingly embraceable contours. Their owners are rarely meanies, and the male who knows them first is in for a delicious and long-lasting experience.

Straight and fairly narrow ears usually belong to females with great pride, courage and positive aspirations. Sexual dalliance is secondary with them. Romantic love, chastity, loyalty and generosity in everything but physical union are traits they hold dearer, even, than genuine male admiration.

Very pale ears belong to dreamers and home-and-husband lovers.

Ears that stick out betray the flying, frantic pleasures-and-foot-sucker.

The spy who knew too much

Major Subic's war memoirs were likely to reveal too much for the world's good. It would be safer for everybody concerned if he let sleeping dogs lie...

FICTION / EDWARD D. HOCH

"WHAT DO you know about Major Gregory Subic?" Hastings asked, pouring two glasses of wine from the decanter in his study.

Rand, who was unaccustomed to the luxury of a dinner with his commanding officer, accepted the glass and took a sip before replying: "When I started in the Department of Consular Communications, he was something like a god, or at least a founding father. There's a photograph of him, taken with Churchill, still hanging in my office. Is he still alive?"

Hastings nodded. "He's alive. Living in Canada, writing his memoirs."

Rand gave a low whistle. "That's a book I'll want to read!"

"Unfortunately the British Government is not quite so eager. In fact, the publication of the book could provoke a serious diplomatic incident."

"In what way?"

Hastings puckered his lips dramatically. "What I am telling you is quite confidential, known only to a few top people."

"I understand." Rand took another sip of the wine.

"Major Subic was a front-line intelligence officer in Burma until he was wounded and shipped back to London. Here he became one of our top cryptanalysts during the final days of the Second World War. In fact, he headed the department which has since developed into your own Double-C, as you well know.

"Just after the Battle of the Bulge, Subic succeeded in deciphering a particularly important Nazi communication. It seemed that some German generals, always unhappy with Hitler, agreed to meet secretly with a former leader of the French Underground. The French leader was to fly to Berlin with General Hans Holder, for a conference on ending the war.

"This was the situation which confronted British Intelligence as the result of Subic's decipherment. They had the exact route and timetable of the German bomber carrying a top Nazi general and a highly respected French resistance leader. The mission of the Frenchman might end the war sooner, but Intelligence doubted its chances for success.

"Stacked against this was the fact that General Holder had helped plan Nazi strategy in the Bulge and might do the same thing again. It was a matter of one Frenchman's life against the lives of thousands of Allied soldiers."

"What are you trying to tell me?"

Rand asked, feeling a sudden chill.

The older man shrugged. "The RAF was ordered to intercept and shoot down the plane. They did so, very efficiently. General Holder was killed. And of course, the Frenchman, Andre Chambon, died too."

"Chambon," Rand repeated the name. "I see. If I remember correctly, he was in suspended as Do Guille at the time."

Hastings nodded. "And Holder was as skilful as Rommel. What would you have done under the circumstances?"

"I don't know," Rand admitted.

"I'm glad the decision wasn't mine to make."

"The incident became one of the footnotes of history," Hastings went on. "It was something of a national tragedy for the French. Naturally, we never admitted prior knowledge of the plane's occupants. It was simply written off as one of the fortunes, or misfortunes, of war."

"And what happened to Major Sibus?"

"Frankly, I believe he went to pieces over the incident. As you know, the European war ended in early May of 1945. About that time we heard a rumor that someone — perhaps Chamberlain — had survived the crash. Sibus went to West Germany to investigate, but of course there was no truth to it. Chamberlain was dead and buried, and I think the shock of actually seeing his grave was a bit too much for Sibus. In any event, he never returned to London. He resigned his commission and moved to Canada. He's been there ever since."

"And now he's writing his memoirs."

"Exactly. An American publishing house approached him some months back and made him a very liberal offer. In fact, they were so anxious to get the book they paid him a large advance before he'd written a single word. We can only suspect they have some knowledge of the bombshell such a book could be. You see, right now our relations with France are improving and with all this Common Market business we can't risk running that, I know it was twenty-five years ago, but the French have long memories. Can you imagine the uproar in Paris if it was revealed that Britain deliberately and knowingly caused the death of a French hero?"

"Can't you stop him from having the book published?"

"Not officially. We don't dare just we're concerned, or the American publisher would be more certain than ever that they're on to something big. That's where you come in, Rand."

Rand smiled slightly. "I know we'd get to me."

"You must fly to Toronto and talk to him. He'll respect you, because you hold the closest thing to the position he held during the war. Bring him to his senses, even promise him money if you have to. Whatever else he writes about, he must not mention the Chamberlain affair."

"And if he won't listen?"

Hastings shrugged. "It's our man against the good of a nation."

Rand felt his face flush. "I'm damned if I'll act as your assassin!"

"Rand, Rand — I meant no such thing!"

"All right," Rand said. "I've always wanted to visit Canada."

"Go back to the book?"

The next morning, in his office, Rand studied the photograph of the handsome, dark-haired man standing at the side of Winston Churchill — a hero then, but now only an old man who knew too much.

The Junco Jet from London settled down to a perfect landing at Toronto International Airport, and Rand passed quickly through the customs formalities. His hotel was downtown, across the street from the new City Hall, a dazzling structure with twin curving towers framed by a wide and shimmering fountain. Rand studied it through the window as he unpacked, then telephoned the man he was to meet — a literary agent named Norman Browder.

They arranged to meet for dinner, and Rand killed the intervening hour with a stroll through downtown in the warmth of July sunshine. Despite some of the place names he had seen on the way in from the airport — Dickens Street and Princess Margaret Park and Gloucester Street — he felt that Toronto was more an American city than the London he'd left. There were occasional hints of the old, but only, it seemed, as an accent to the new.

The agent, Browder, was one of the new. He was a small man with a shaggy mop of hair and quick nervous eyes, and he seemed to know his business well. He was uncertain about the vague reasons for Rand's visit, and he spoke as if he could feel his commission slipping away with every sentence.

"If you want to see Major Sabot about British rights to his book, I'm the man to deal with. He picked me out of the phone book after the New York publishers came to see him. I'm handling all business matters."

"It's more a personal matter," Rand assured him. "I have a job quite similar to Major Sabot's old position in London."

"I hope you are better at making wares, General."

Tasmania's oldest inhabitant

IN THE ICY MOUNTAIN pools of Tasmania lives the little shrimp Anaspid, which many scientists believe to be the oldest kind of animal life existing in the world today.

Zoologists first identified and described Anaspid in 1892. They were astonished to find that the shrimp had a straight back, unlike every other known present day species.

The only related shrimp appeared to be a family found in European and American lochs from the carboniferous era — millions of years even before the dinosaurs appeared. But the type had long been extinct everywhere in the world — except Tasmania.

Known in Tasmania to simply the "mountain shrimp", Anaspid lives today in the so-called mountain pools of Mount Wellington and the Maria Mountains. They grow to about two inches in length, and live on mosses and small water creatures. They cannot survive in warm flowing waters.

Scientists believe Anaspid has survived because its environment has remained virtually unchanged for millions of years. It is the only species of its tiny cold world, with plenty of food and no natural enemies.

So far Anaspid has outlived the giant amphibians and the dinosaurs. It may even outlive man.

"The small man's eyes widened. "You mean, you're a spy?"

"No more than Major Sabic was. We work with codes and concealed messages, not with people."

"I tell you, Sabic is one tough customer! He treats nobody. At first he didn't even want to do the book. I don't think he'd have agreed to it yet, except that he needs the money. He was teaching languages at the University, but he's too old for this now."

"I've talked with tough customers before," Rand said.

"Fine! Then I'll drive you out to his apartment. It's on Scarborough Bluffs, overlooking Lake Ontario. A fine location, right next to the Hunt Club's private golf course. He wants to keep that sort of life more than anything, but he needs money to do it."

Major Sabic greeted them at the door of his apartment. He was a white-haired man of 65 or so with thin hands and pale frightened eyes. His wrinkled skin was tanned from the summer sun, but it was a sickly tan. There was no longer any evidence of the vigorous, dark-haired Englishman who had stood at Churchill's side so many years before. Even the eyes were different now, older, more weary.

"It's a pleasure to meet you, Major," Rand said, extending his hand. "Your techniques are still highly regarded in London."

Sabic smiled thinly in response and motioned them to seats by the window. Out across the lake they could see scattered yachts drifting with the evening breeze.

"I am pleased to meet you too, Mr. Rand," Sabic said, "but you must excuse me if I put you to a little test."

In this instance one does not reach my age without being careful. You could be an assassin from across the sea, sent to kill me."

Rand saw that the man was serious. He really feared for his life. "I'm hardly that. I have identification—"

"Papers can be so easily forged these days, Mr. Rand. If you are who you claim, certainly you can identify the following for me, H-21, Professor Zapp, and 0075."

Rand grinned, feeling a bit like a schoolboy. "Professor Zapp was the German technician who perfected and simplified the micromat during the early days of the Second World War. And 0075 was the German diplomatic code in which the famed Zimmerman telegram of World War I was sent."

"Very good! But I believe you neglected H-21."

"That was the German designation for one of their most famous spies — Mata Hari."

Major Sabic relaxed in his chair, apparently satisfied. "Now we can talk," he said. "But first I must give my completed manuscript to Mr. Browder." He produced a bulky folder of typewritten sheets. Take this back and read it. We don't need you here."

"I need him to get me back downtown," Rand said.

"I'll call a taxi for you," Sabic waved a hand and the little spent retreated, the thick manuscript tucked under his arm. When they were alone, Sabic poured two glasses of brandy and passed one to Rand. "Now tell me what you really want," he said.

Rand cleared his throat, not

"This one's $495 — plus 5c deposit on the bottle . . ."

knowing exactly how to put it. "Frankly, Major, there is some concern in London about your forthcoming book. They fear you may be indiscreet in discussing the Chamberlain matter in the closing days of the war."

The old face seemed to grow a shade whiter. "I understand their concern," Sabre answered slowly, picking his words with care. "But the book deals mainly with my youth and later years in Canada. There is very little of the wartime years, and nothing that is not a matter of public record."

"Won't that disappoint your publisher?" He isn't paying all the money for boyhood memories."

the more unlikely it seemed.

Rand spent the rest of the evening exploring downtown Toronto, marveling at the number of cinemas, at the swarms of young people who crowded the sidewalks. It was not too different from Times Square or Piccadilly on a summer's night, he decided.

Back at his hotel, slipping into bed just after midnight, he was startled by a tapping on the door. "Who's there?" he asked, opening it just a crack.

A slim young girl with long blonde hair and a peering mouth stood there. "Please let me in — I must talk to you!"

Wingen—the burning mountain

THE AUSTRALIAN CONTINENT is formed of old, stable rocks, and there are no active volcanoes south of New Guinea. But early settlers believed they had found one north-west of Newcastle in 1826.

When the settlers had seen Mt. Wingen, also known as Burning Mountain — which contains a mass of slow burning coal.

This coal is part of the famous Great Basins, the source of some of Australia's finest coal. Professor Edgeworth David investigated the phenomenon in 1909, and stated that the coal was burning at a depth of about 1500 feet below ground level.

Edgeworth David estimated that the mass had been slowly burning away for about 50,000 years. His theory was that it was originally started by spontaneous combustion.

The fire is smoldering away along the main at a rate of about three feet every year. After about 1000 the quantity of smoke gradually increased so the fire traveled south, but it flared up again in 1917. Huge quantities of smoke poured out of the mountain's crevices during the 1930s.

Today the fire has diminished, but it is still burning on a face about 60 feet wide. Some of the stones on the surface are white-hot, and pure yellow sulphur has accumulated on the sides of the vents.

Geologists expect that the fire will finally die out when it reaches the summit of Mount Wingen. But that will probably not be for a good many centuries yet.

"No," Sabre admitted, "he isn't I believe he listed the rumors about Chamberlain from one of the RAF pilots who flew the mission — at least, that's what he told me. They thought I'd have the full story, so they came to me. But, believe me, I go into no great detail about it. The British Empire is in no way compromised."

There might have been a wondrous rage to his voice, but Rand chose to ignore it. He didn't really like the man, and that fact equally disappointed him. "London will be pleased," he said simply.

He stayed another half-hour, discussing the attractions of Canadian living, and then rode back down to see a film Sabre suggested. It had all been so easy — perhaps too easy. Would Sabre really have gleamed over an accident so shattering to him that he'd left his job and country because of it? The more Rand thought of it,

Rand, acquainted with the techniques of cat girls who worked the big hotels, hesitated. "I think you have the wrong room, Miss."

"You're Mr. Rand, aren't you? From London? I've been waiting for you all evening." She seemed close to tears. "I'm Margaret Fleming, Mr. Browder's secretary."

More curious than anything else, Rand opened the door. "All right," he asked when she was seated in the room's only chair. "What's this all about? Did Browder send you here?"

She shook her head, and in the light from the bedside lamp he saw that she was quite pretty, with soft pink skin just beginning to acquire a summer's tan. "He doesn't know I came. But I overheard him arranging to meet you, and I know you're a British agent of some sort. I'm afraid for him, Mr. Rand."

He sat down on the edge of the bed. "Afraid?"

"I suppose I should start with my boy friend Terry. He's an American who came up here to escape the draft. He lives with some other American boys, and he's taking a writing course at the University. His teacher is a woman named Iris Montan. She's older, around 50, and she knows just about everyone. She speaks to a lot of the youth groups around Toronto."

"Anyway, last week Terry happened to report to her what I'd mentioned about Major Sabre's book. She told him Sabre's life could be in danger, and my boss's too! She said some people from the past might not like the idea of him writing a book of memoirs."

"Major Sabre was engaged in cryptography. It's hardly a line of work to inspire murder after so many years."

"I don't know, but that's what she told Terry."

"Are you in love with this Terry?"

She twisted her hands nervously. "We'd be married if it wasn't for my family. They tell him a happy because his hair is long."

"Well, I think you're worrying needlessly, Miss Fleming. But if it'll make you feel better, I'll talk to Terry's teacher, the Iris Montan."

"Oh, thank you! I knew a British agent could help me."

Rand smiled and let her out. Then he went into bed, wondering about Iris Montan and her connection with Major Sabre's past.

The University of Toronto was deep into its summer sessions and Rand found the downtown campus alive with students. He had arranged to meet Iris Montan on the grassy quadrangle off King's College Road, and he found it a pleasant surprise place that reminded him of the little squares so common to British schools. He was studying the old stone buildings with their narrow windows when Iris Montan approached.

"You're Mr. Rand?" she asked. She was a striking woman who obviously took pains about her appearance, and each gazing he was exactly in place. He thought she'd probably been beautiful once.

"Do I look that much different from your students?" he asked.

"Quite a bit, actually," she said with a smile. "I'm Iris Montan. You wanted to see me?"

"I'm over from London for a few days," he explained. "I understand you have a student named Terry in one of your writing classes."

The time of the catfish

The devastating natural disasters which have shattered Japan more and more frequently through the years are now feared more than a nuclear war. FACT / GENE JAMES

"THE JAPANESE people are infinitely more terrified of the catfish than they are of the atomic, hydrogen, or even the cobalt bomb."

The above statement was made recently by a man who has spent the major part of his life in Japan, who has a Japanese wife, and who, although a former POW who was subjected to all the usual horrors of Japanese internment, can still find it in his heart to love both the Japanese and their beautiful country.

The writer later discovered, after questioning better than a score of people — both Australians who have lived in Japan and Japanese nationals themselves — that this amazing and seemingly absurd allegation was, and is, completely accurate and without embellishment of any kind.

For to the Japanese "catfish" means earthquakes. And Japan has experienced more mass-horror, mass-misery, and mass-death than any other nation in the world, because its islands happen to be situated near a whole series of geographical faults and permanent seismic disturbances. Japanese mythology, like their Shinto religion, is an effect of detailed cata-history of spirits of all sizes, shapes, and kinds.

These spirits shake literally everywhere — in trees, within rocks, inside dogs, cats, frogs, snakes, even cock-roaches. But the most feared spirit of all is that of the "quake catfish," of Jubito, as the Japanese call their earthquakes.

According to Japanese mythology, a huge catfish lies beneath the ground, and in every stirring, its slightest tremor, produces movements of the earth. These expanding ripples of shock can either rattle the family crockery or topple buildings according to the giant creature's whim.

This subterranean monster is supposedly controlled by a river-stone, situated in the precincts of the Kashima Shrine in Hitachi Province.

Many centuries ago, according to legend, a lord of the Mito clan tried to search out and then destroy the stone. He hoped that by doing so he might bring an end to the curse of the "quake," but after many adventures he failed to accomplish his task.

But if the "quake catfish" is a myth, the earthquake itself most certainly is not, and is stated the national terror for it surpasses all others. And with excellent reason.

In the last six centuries Japan has experienced 13 major earthquakes and tidal wave-storming from them. And the fact the people of Nippon find most alarming is that out of that fatal dozen, six have occurred since 1923, and the last four since 1948 — indicating an actual weakening of the crust in our globe's volcanic belt. Such a geological structural change, if it exists, may well be eventually fatal to Nippon.

In a single decade, between 1923 and 1933, the Japanese Central Meteorological Observatory registered 21,845 tremors — all strong enough in intensity to be felt by people.

Using these figures as a basis, the possibility of Japan suffering the fate of Atlantis, that mysterious continent that disappeared in some great and ancient cataclysm, is not entirely a far-fetched suggestion. If the pattern of the great "quake" continues it may well become a dreadful reality.

Of the last six upheavals, by far the most disastrous was the one known as "The Great Kanto Earthquake." It struck, completely without warning, on a Saturday morning September 1, 1923.

The half-holiday had started in a festive spirit in Tokyo. Public offices, banks and shops were just about to close, and photos of entertainment and relaxation were just beginning to open in preparation for the weekend holiday crowds. As the clock-hands pointed to 11.38 am a rumbling sound like some gigantic fist approaching train filled the air with shuddering vibrations.

It was followed immediately by a series of sharp, vertical earthquake shocks, lifting the earth's crust and then dropping it.

"Jubito! Jubito!" The dreaded warning for earthquakes sounded on the tops of millions throughout the cities of Tokyo and Yokohama.

Within seconds, the heaving earth reduced brick and stone buildings to heaps of rubble, burying thousands. People huddled in the streets beneath a burning sun, and remained there under the stars through the clear and chilly autumn night.

Occasionally showers detached themselves, but there was no let-up or release from their nightmare ordeal. Great shocks continued to be felt throughout the day, keeping the terrified crowds out in the open away from any buildings.

The shocks continued right through until September 18. The total number recorded was 1619.

The first shocks were followed by raging fires which completely gutted Yokohama and destroyed half of Tokyo. In Tokyo alone, 366,262 homes were destroyed.

THE OYSTER PIRATES

Barton masterminded the deal. He knew a lot about the oyster business. But that was all he knew. FICTION / C. H. CHRISTIE

I DIDN'T LIKE Barton in the first place. I should never have made that illegal oyster deal with him, but it sounded so good at the time and I was just about broke.

I had been throwing for profits in the deep just outside Townsville, and the refrigeration unit in my boat had broken down. Barton was a refrigeration mechanic. In fact, Barton was a lot of things. He was in the oyster business down in Sydney and his father had leases on the Hawkesbury River. He knew all about the oyster market and I couldn't help but be intrigued when he suggested the deal.

We stood in the public bar of the Criterion Hotel and walked down a couple of hours.

"I tell you, Doyle, I've never seen oysters like them before," he said enthusiastically.

He was always enthusiastic. He talked too much. He was of average height, about 30, with sandy yellow hair and pale blue eyes. When he got excited I swear his eyes used to change color — become a deeper shade of blue.

"Yeah?" I said sceptically.

"Yeah," Barton asserted. "Look, Doyle. I've fixed your refrigeration unit. Your boat is ready for sea. Now how about it?"

"It's too far," I replied. "I've been around the top into the Gulf a few times, but Bougainville . . . You must be joking!"

"It's not Bougainville," Barton explained. "It's Toraki Island."

"Yeah. But it's still in the Solomon Islands and doesn't cost a cent to go. We'd never make a profit out of it. Besides, it's illegal. The administration won't grant permits for that area."

"Forget about the bloody administration. I tell you, they're a special kind of oyster. They're huge — as big as a snail. I've never seen oysters like them before. Something must have happened on that island to make those oysters grow so big. They'll retail at three dollars a dozen in Sydney."

"Hell!" I said. "Who's going to pay three dollars a dozen for your oysters when the local brand sell for 45 cents a bottle?"

Barton stared at me, his pale blue eyes hard.

"I know the oyster business," he but out. "You know the proven business. People pay more for oysters on the shell, because they're considered a luxury. Those oysters will sell to the big hotels. They'll be a money-maker."

I shrugged. The premises had not been running well lately and I was broke. Esmereilda, my traveler, had cost me a bundle to repair. I owed Smiley, my half-Aboriginal mate, six weeks back money. This proposition was illegal, but . . .

"I'll pay for the oil and all the equipment we'll need," Barton said. "We go fifty-fifty on the deal. How about it?"

"How do we get the oysters down to Sydney?"

"We'll come back to Townsville," Barton replied. "The first batch will go air freight. The rest will go by refrigerated road transport."

I thought for a few seconds more. I didn't like the bastard, but I was desperate for money.

"Okay," I said.

Esmereilda headed out to sea, her bow dipping into the night swell. We passed Magnetic Island and the water became a deeper blue. It wasn't long before we were dodging the coral outcrops of the Great Barrier Reef.

The Reef always fascinated me.

Twelve hundred miles long, and the greatest stretch of coral in the world. I'd fished around the Reef for years and it had been kind to me.

When the process stopped running, I always managed to get a snake from the tearing waters of the Reef. Fish were plentiful there and easily caught.

Smiley was at the wheel. A raw-boned half-caste with the low, flat forehead of the Australian Aboriginal, he always had a grin on his thick lips.

"How you going, Smiley?" I asked.

Smiley waved his hand at the sparkling blue sea.

"That's a the life, boss," he said. "Better than working for those bloody cow cookies!"

I had picked Smiley up one Saturday night in Townsville about six months ago. He was lying in the gutter, dead drunk. I got him on to my boat to let him sleep it off.

When he came to, he was fascinated with Esmereilda. He had been working on a cattle station out West and was tired of the heat and dust of the inland.

I took an immediate liking to Smiley. He was intelligent and was good company. He wanted to come out on a pearling run and after a week that was it. He was part of the outfit now.

Barton didn't like Smiley. But then Barton didn't like anything. He was sea sick, and spent most of his time in his bunk.

Presently he staggered up on deck, his face pale. His sandy hair was rumpled and he had been sleeping in his clothes.

"How long will it be now?" he muttered.

"A couple of days."

"Jeez!" he groaned. He stared at the flat sea wearily. "I've never been out on a small boat like this before."

"She's a good boat, mate," Smiley said. "You must have a sensitive stomach."

"Shut up!" Barton growled.

He stared ahead at the horizon, clutching the bridge rail. I walked over to him. I snuffed whisky on his breath.

"How did you find out about Toraki Island?" I asked.

Barton grimaced. "My old man was up in Bougainville during the war. He was an engineer. He brought back some oyster shells and he's been talking about them ever since. He's always been in the oyster business. He told me Toraki Island was the most fantastic place he'd ever seen.

The oysters grow on the mangroves in millions."

"Hub," I said.

"My old man is financing this deal," Barton continued. "He's determined to exploit those big oysters. He reckons there's a fortune to be made. It'll be something new."

I relieved Smiley at the wheel and Barton staggered down the steps to his bunk.

"What do you think of him, Smiley?" I asked.

Smiley grinned. "He's a weak bastard," he said. "He drinks too much. Did you see the game of whisky he brought on board?"

"Yeah," I said heavily.

Three days later Samaraka lay at anchor just inside the reef at Torok Island. The sun shone from a blistering sky. Palm trees stood silent around the lagoon, and the thick jungle stamped with the afternoon heat.

I had on a pair of shorts cut down from old jeans. I wore stained tennis shoes and nothing else. Smiley was also in shorts, barefoot.

"Oh, the flesh wasn't THAT bad."

Barton came up on deck dressed like a monkey. He wore light gray pants and a camouflage white shirt and tie.

"Christ!" I said. "Where are you going? To a dance or something?"

"I'm going to talk to the beonga," he said harshly. "They expect a white man to look decent."

I shrugged. We rowed ashore in the dinghy and walked towards the native village with a horde of curious children at our heels. Thatched huts surrounded a cleared patch of jungle. Smoke from fires spiraled slowly into the still air.

Bare-breasted women looked coyly at the ground as we walked past. The men stared at us curiously, colorful lap-laps swathed around their hips.

I noticed that these natives were different to the New Guinea types. Their skin is black, whereas the New Guinea natives is brown. Their body hair was not short.

The head man came out from the largest hut. He was a fine-looking fellow, gray-haired, about 50 years of age. He had on a pair of white shorts and a white shirt. He wore no shoes.

"You talk-talk English?" Barton asked in an attempt at pidgin.

"Yes," the head man said in perfect English. "I went to a mission school on Bougainville. What can I do for you?"

Barton looked surprised. Smiley grinned.

"We want labor to collect oysters from the mangroves on Torok Island. We've got trade goods and tobacco to pay for it."

The head man frowned, deep in thought. At last he spoke. "We don't want trade goods. We want money — Australian dollars."

Barton was silent. He had not his watch here. He hit his lip. "How much?" he asked.

"Four dollars a day."

Barton looked grim. As he was financing the whole deal I kept out of it. I knew he had an educated native to wrangle with and that was as good for top money.

I left them to thrash it out. I wandered around with Sam, examining the village. After two

Building the "Rum Hospital"

IN THE EARLY COLONIAL DAYS there was a great shortage of currency for exchange in New South Wales, and rum was one of the staples of the frontier economy which earned for the settlement's first 26 years.

The "Rum Hospital" was built by W. Rossy Minnoworth, Alexander Riley and Gamblers Blackall between 1811 and 1816 as a direct result of this traffic in liquor.

The partners offered to build a two-storey hospital 287 feet long and 28 feet deep, to be "one of the finest public buildings in any of His Majesty's colonies".

In return they requested the right to import 45,000 gallons of rum and dispose of it within three years — which amounted to a virtual monopoly of the rum trade.

The Government agreed to their terms, and got their hospital. The authorities did not have to provide the partners with anything except 50 axes, 20 drought bullocks and 20 convict labourers.

The "Rum Hospital" building still stands. It is now occupied by the NSW State Parliament.

hours, I came back.

Barton was squatting in the hut with the head man, an empty whisky bottle by his side. The head man was drunk. His black eyes rolled when I walked inside.

Barton laughed contemptuously.

"We've settled on two dollars a day for men, one dollar for women," he said. "This a bottle a day for the chief here. How about that?"

Barton treated the natives like dirt. He hired all the young men and young women available. He gave them buckets and a machete. They waded around among the mangroves eating the huge oysters from the trees, dropping them into the floating buckets.

The oysters were then taken out to Emeralds by dinghy and pushed into the refrigerated hold. It was hot, sweaty work.

After a couple of days Barton caught one young native resting on a small sandy beach.

"Get back to work, you lazy bastard!" Barton yelled.

The native jumped to his feet and played at Barton. Barton walked forward and booted the man on the buttocks. The native picked up his machete and swung it wildly.

Barton drew a .38 revolver from the holster he always wore buckled to his waist. The native backed away, fear and hatred in his black eyes.

"Get back to work, you lazy scum!" Barton yelled.

I ran quickly along the beach towards them.

"Take it easy, Barton!" I cried. "That's the chief's son!"

Barton swung around, his face red. "I don't care who it is! These boongs just won't work! I'm paying them two dollars a day and they're going to drink it!"

I smelled the whisky then. Barton had been drinking. His blue eyes were bloodshot and his face was driven. His sandy hair was matted with sweat. He had on a khaki shirt and khaki pants and great patches of sweat showed at his armpits and down his back.

"Take it easy," I suggested.

The native picked up his bucket and ran off to join the others heaving oysters from the mangroves.

"Go to hell, Doyle!" Barton gritted. He stalked off angrily towards the village.

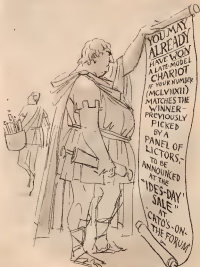

The climate of Torika Island was hot and humid. It rained every afternoon at about 3 o'clock, great sheets of water flooding down from the sky. Barton wouldn't let the natives shelter from the rain. He shouted and yelled at them to keep working and keep the oysters flowing into the hold.

When the sun came out again, steam rose from the surrounding jungle. It was like living in a sauna bath.

The nights were hot and clammy. I lay in my bunk aboard Emeralds and listened to the crocodiles grunting in the distance. I could not sleep. I smoked cigarette after cigarette, and wondered if the chief ever in the village would let Barton continue to abuse his people.

The days passed and nothing happened.

Seamen have been reporting sightings of unknown monsters for hundreds of years. Are ALL their stories hoaxes or mistakes?

FACT / RICHARD INNES

ON FEBRUARY 4, 1963, a young French photographer suddenly landed on the front pages of newspapers all around Australia. The photographer, Robert Le Sarrac, claimed he had seen a serpent-like monster 80 feet long at Hook Island in the Whitsunday group on the Barrier Reef. Le Sarrac told reporters he had swum in the shallow water alongside the monster, and had filmed it with a 16 mm movie camera.

At the time of the incident, Le Sarrac was half-way through a leisurely round-the-world trip with his wife and two young children. The Le Sarracs left France on their yacht in 1960, and were eventually wrecked on the Barrier Reef in late 1964. They bought a launch and decided to spend three months on Hook Island with a friend from Sydney, Hank de Jong.

The most popular choice of would-be monster explanations. Many people try to account for monster sightings by suggesting that a group of long-necked dinosaurs, like the three imaginatively pictured here, may have survived until covered near the Cretaceous period 70 million years ago.

RIDDLE OF THE SEA SERPENT

Le Serec told the press that at 9 am on December 12, the whole party was crossing Storöfjärden Bay in the launch to get fresh water. Half-way across, Madame Le Serec pointed out a huge object at the bottom of the bay. It looked something like a huge elongated tadpole, with a big head and a long narrow body.

Le Serec loaded their two 16 mm cameras with film while de Jong started the launch in a slow circle around the motionless creature. They saw that it had a big white mark like a wound on its body. They took film and still photos of it.

Le Serec said that after half an hour he and de Jong decided to look at the creature under water, and had made no move in that time. Le Serec dived first with a camera, and de Jong followed armed with a spear-gun.

Le Serec started filming at about quarter, and then the creature suddenly opened its mouth in a threatening way and started to move. It lifted off the bottom and turned towards Le Serec and de Jong. Both men backed away and fled to the launch. Madame Le Serec told them that the creature had swum off through the reef to the open sea. They could not follow it because the launch's motor failed, and they did not see it again.

Le Serec's story is the latest account of a sea-serpent in Australian waters, and possibly the best. It seems a pity to dismiss it as a hoax. But a hoax is what it was.

Investigation showed that Le Serec had left France hastily, leaving unpaid debts for his supplies. Before he left he tried to talk some men into joining him on a voyage, hinting that it would be financially profitable for them. "It's to do with the sea serpent," he told them.

Le Serec's film proved to be fuzzy and blurred, showing nothing that looked like a live 80-footer. When he returned to France in 1966, he was arrested for absconding his debts and sentenced to six months' jail.

The full story of Le Serec's hoax received wide press coverage in Europe. One effect of this, perhaps an unfortunate one, was to further discredit the case for a real sea-serpent. And today most marine biologists believe that there is a case, quite a strong one, for the existence of some large unknown creature which has given rise to the legend.

In a way, sea serpents are a lot like flying saucers. A considerable number of sightings are reported for each. The great part of these may be explained away by some kind of natural cause. A number are undoubtedly human. But in each case of hard case is left of sightings which appear to be genuine and which cannot be explained away. You either believe these or you deliberately close off your mind.

There are two types of sea serpent report — reports of living monsters, and reports of alleged carcasses cast up ashore. There have been several reports of both kinds in Australian waters in this country.

The two most recent, apart from La Serpent, were both carcasses. Both of them were explained. A mysterious 30-foot lump of hairy decaying flesh found on a Tasmanian beach 10 years ago subsequently proved to be part of a dead whale. A fragments off Mackay.

Possibly the most trustworthy account of a sea-serpent in Australian waters is due to a letter written by a French sea-captain in 1923. He was Eugène Jallard, of the steamer Saint-François-Xavier, on the Tongking-New Caledonia-Australia run. His account was contained in a private letter to one of his superiors. It could not well be a hoax, since it was not made public until 1937.

Jallard reported that the ship was passing the heads at Port Stephens on passage from Noumea to Newcastle at about 6.30 pm on February 1, 1923, when two large oblong like turtles' shells were seen about 30 feet off the starboard bow.

"Abrupt of the engines," wrote

Following the spread of rumors in the port that she had met a sea-serpent 100 feet long on passage in the South Atlantic, the Admiralty of the Admiralty asked her captain to supply either a denial or a detailed report.

Captain Peter McQuhrie sent them a report "I have the honor to acquaint you . . . that at 5 pm on the 6th of August last, at lat 24° 44' S, and long 90° 12' E, . . . something very unusual was seen by Mr. Suttons, ship's purser, rapidly approaching the ship from before the beam.

"On our attention being called to the object it was discovered to be an enormous serpent, with head and shoulders kept about four feet above the surface of the water. As nearly as we could appreciate by comparing it with the length of what our main-topgall yard would show in the water, there was at the very least 60 feet of the animal visible, no part of which was, to our perception, used in propelling it through the water, either by vertical or horizontal undulations.

"It passed rapidly, but so close under our lee quarter that, had it been a man of my acquaintance, I should easily have recognized his features with the naked eye. It did not . . . deviate in the slightest degree from its course to the SW, which it held at the pace of from 12 to 15 miles per hour.

"The diameter of the serpent was about 15 or 16 inches behind the head, which was, without doubt, that of a snake, its color a dark brown, with yellowish white about the throat. It had no fins, but something like a mane of a horse, or rather a bunch of whiskers, washed about its back.

"I am having a drawing of the serpent made from a sketch taken immediately after it was seen, which I hope to have ready for transmission to my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty by tomorrow's post."

The letter by Captain McQuhrie was published in The Times on October 13, and pictures of the monster taken from sketches by the witnesses and approved by them appeared in the Illustrated London News a fortnight later.

Research disclosed that this was not the first time British naval officers had sighted sea-monsters. There had been previous instances in 1830, 1836, 1839 and 1833.

Captain McQuhrie's letter inspired the inevitable crop of new hoaxes, while naturalists and seamen tried to find a "logical" explanation for what he described.

Settlers and bushfires

MANY HIGHLY COLORED tales are told of the dangerous fights the early settlers had with bushfires. But actually, the old bushmen rarely "battled fire".

There was an almost impossible task in dry, hilly or hilly in particular, because fire in thick leaf moulds would not be extinguished, it just went on smouldering and burnt into flames behind the firefighter, even in the middle of the night.

The bushmen often went to the trouble of burning off country long before the dangerous time. When the grass was too green they cut protective firebreaks, often mowing strips for miles with a scythe.

As soon as a bushfire approached the whole family went out and "burned back" in the cool of the evening, to check the blaze with a burnt-out strip.

The burning off of all the grass did not necessarily mean tragedy. The stock usually managed to subvert on smouldering grass fires or poisonous plants in the pasture and I can testify.

In fact, the aim was done about the time most fires came and often fell to give green food within a few days.

long, narrow creature found at Beach in 1934 was an eel-like, ribbon-like deep-sea fish growing to about 20 feet which at sometimes cast up dying after a storm.

A lone sea-serpent was reported in 1962 at British Island, to the north of Queensland. A beachcomber and he had seen a monster "like something out of a nightmare" two miles offshore, and had watched it for about four minutes through field-glasses. It was whitish-grey in color, about 12 feet long, and seemed to have a swimmer's neck, a whale's body and a fish's tail and fins. The director of the Queensland Museum suggested that it was a herring shark, although according to the description it looked nothing like one.

Another monster was reported by a number of people near Townsville in 1934. It was nearly 100 feet long, with three bumps covered with barbed spines and a head like a huge snake's. It was seen by parties of fishermen, and also by the crew of a

Captain Jallard, "there rose a big head like a camel's, on a long flexible neck having a great similarity to a swimmer's. The body, as thick as big barrels, formed a chain of five bumps. On the fourth bump was a large fin like a shark's, five feet high. The fin seemed to be black in color. The color of the animal was dirty yellow, the skin smooth without the appearance of scales."

Jallard and the monster was seen by the ship's officers, Polynesian crew and Chinese sailors. "The animal was visible for 15 minutes," he wrote. "No optical illusion is possible."

The most famous sea-serpent sighting of all was reported more than a century ago by a number of thoroughly reliable witnesses. The monster — a long, snake-like one this time — crossed the path of a British warship on the high seas.

The steam-sloop HMS Rushmore, 19 guns, arrived at Plymouth from the East Indies on October 4, 1848.

THE BLIND MAN AND THE BLACKMAILER

The blind man was able to identify the corpse by touch as the man he'd met in the boarding-house. But according to the doctor, the fellow had died half an hour before then . . .

FICTION / PETER SINCLAIR

DINNER finished, Detective Constable Donald Burke pushed back his chair. "Last night Inspector O'Hare and I made police history," he announced. "We had a body identified by a blind man. Rather unique, wouldn't you say?"

"Under no circumstances would I say something was 'rather unique'," his father-in-law, Edgar Hodgkins, answered. "You might as well say a girl is almost a virgin or that she's slightly pregnant."

"God," Donald croaked, appealing to his wife, Eileen, who was at the sink. "What d'you do with the hair-splitting old goat?"

"Come on, Dad," said Eileen, "you know what Donald meant. After all, it is rather unusual for a blind man to identify a body."

Hodgkins nodded. "Rather unusual - yes. Rather unique - never."

Eileen gave up. Apparently her father was in one of his difficult moods.

"Tell me about it, Donald," she said. "It sounds interesting."

Donald lit a cigarette and began. "Well, about nine o'clock last night Inspector O'Hare rang the station from a boarding house in Bagin Street, Moanin, where the body was found. The landlord had reported it over the police emergency number, and the radio room sent the message straight out to the Inspector's car.

"I went straight over there. Bag old house on a corner, two storeys, like a rabbit warren inside and all sorts of odds and ends straying in and out. The body was sitting up large as life in an easy chair in one of the bedrooms on the ground floor, off the hall.

"Apparently the dead man had moved in only the previous night. Mr. Solomons, the landlord, who found the body, said he'd never seen him before. A girl had rented the room a few days earlier, paid Mr. Solomons the first week's rent and taken the key. No one in the house had ever clapped eyes on the dead man and only this blind chap had as much as spoken to him."

"Did the blind man live at the boarding house?" Eileen asked.

"Yes. In the next room."

"On which side - nearer the front door or further along the hall?" Hodgkins asked, eyes closed, head back, hand pointed to the ceiling.

"Oh, as you've come down to earth, have you?" said Donald. "The blind man, whose name is Philip James, lives in the room next up the hall. He'd been out for a walk - he has one of those long, white sticks, you know the kind - and on the way back he decided to call on the new boarder just to be sociable. James knew the man was in his room because he'd heard him moving about on the way out for his walk. He knocked on the door, which was open a little, and called out 'Are you there, Mr. Tyler?'"

"How did he know the man's name?" Hodgkins asked.

"At breakfast yesterday morning Mr. Solomons told the other boarders about Mr. Tyler's arrival, although Tyler himself didn't surface. Anyway, Tyler called out to come in. So James went in, introduced himself and went into a rather self-conscious explanation about being blind. Tyler asked to be excused for not getting up and said he hadn't been feeling well."

"James headed in the direction the voice was coming from and stumbled unexpectedly into Tyler's feet and knees. Tyler was sitting in an armchair in the middle of the room. After apologising for being so clumsy, James asked if he might just run his fingers lightly over Tyler's face since he liked to have some idea of the appearance of any person he was talking to.

"Tyler took his hand and placed it on his cheek. James says he felt Tyler flinch slightly as his hand made contact, as if he found the operation discomforting. So, not feeling particularly welcome, James made some excuse about wanting to listen to the radio and asked what time it was. He says Tyler told him it was 8.35, but it must have been a bit earlier than that because the doctor examined the body at 10 o'clock and Tyler had been dead already for at least two hours - strangled.

"Anyhow, later on, after the landlady discovered the body — he saw the door open and peeped in — we couldn't find anyone except James who could positively identify Tyler. James told us he had felt Tyler's face and if we would take him to the body he could tell whether or not it was him. These blind chaps must have a fantastic sense of touch."

"But not such a good sense of time or distance, eh?" said Hodgkins.

"Apparently not."

"What else could Mr James tell you about Tyler?"

Donald shook his head. "Nothing very helpful. After all they'd had only one very short conversation. He did mention that Tyler spoke with an American accent, although I don't see yet where that's going to get us. It seems either he's an American or someone who's lived there long enough to pick up an accent, or it could have been put on."

"Why should Tyler have put on an accent?"

"So James wouldn't be able to identify him later. It must have been obvious to Tyler that James was blind, so if he changed his voice there would be no way James could identify him. You see, Tyler was in the blackened barroom and the girl who rented the room was his partner. We found a heavy metal box in a false bottom of a suitcase under the bed in his room beside the strong box were three negatives and several prints from each. I need hardly say what they were pictures of."

"The chef sends his compliments, Sir."

"Were they those sort of pictures?" Enns asked, agitated.

"Fetid so."

"And did you recognize any of the...ah, subjects?" Hodgkins asked.

"It was the same girl in each picture — the one who rented the room for Tyler. Solomon recognized her when we showed him one. We haven't picked down any of the three men in the pictures yet, but we will. There are one or two questions I'd like to ask them."

Enns put her rubber washing-up gloves under the sink. "You think one of them killed him?"

"They're the only ones with a motive that we know of so far, so they're at the top of my list."

"What about the girl?" Hodgkins asked. "Are you looking for her?"

"Oh, she'll turn up. Right now we're more interested in the men."

"You seem to be working on the assumption that whoever killed Tyler didn't have access to the strong-box."

"Well, it was still locked when we found it. The key was pushed under the carpet and Tyler's prints were the only ones on the key and the box."

"And those circumstances, you think, are sufficient grounds for assuming the killer is one of the men in the photos?"

"They're good enough grounds for me," said Donald. "You're in an argumentative mood tonight, aren't you?"

"Perhaps less tolerant than usual," Hodgkins conceded.

"Tolerant? What's being tolerant got to do with it?"

"All right, Dad, that's enough," said Enns, sensing a blow-up. "I'm sure Donald's telling you all this only because he thinks you might be interested."

"I am interested."

"You're only interested in arguing," Donald cut in hotly.

"Nothing of the sort. I'm interested in seeing that you don't make a fool of yourself by..."

Donald exploded. "Oh, shut up. I'm sick and tired of..." The telephone rang and Donald broke off to answer it.

"Are we still in first class, Alfred?"

"I'll be right over," he said quickly. He hung up and turned to Eames. "That was the Inspector. They've found the girl."

"Dead, I assume," Hodgkins said quietly.

Donald opened his mouth to reply, thought better of it, and left, slamming the door behind him.

"She's dead all right," said Hodgkins. "I was afraid of that. It looks like Donald's off on the wrong track again."

"How can you be so sure, Dad?" Hodgkins asked bleakly. "Time will tell, unfortunately."

Eames and Hodgkins were drowsing in front of the television when Donald came home late that night.

Eames yawned and stretched her legs. "Have you eaten, dear?"

"Not hungry," Donald grunted and threw himself down on the lounge. He looked thoughtfully across the room at his father-in-law, who appeared to be asleep in the armchair. "You know she'd turn up dead, didn't you?"

Hodgkins didn't open his eyes. "It seemed probable."

"Why?"

"Various reasons."

"Tell me."

Hodgkins yawned and sat up. "Let's not get our positions mixed. You still haven't caught the murderer. That's the first task. The explanations can wait until later. Now, tell me about the girl...when did you find her?"

"She'd fallen from a balcony in a block of house units at Cronshaw - or that's what it looks like. Just before nine o'clock tonight a man who lives in one of the units went out to put his car away. He says it took him only two minutes to drive up the ramp from the street and into his parking bay under the building. Then he saw the girl's body lying on the ground. He's positive it wasn't there when he went out to the car, because he would have had to walk right over it. So that fixes the time of death pretty definitely about nine o'clock. The boys from forensic are sure that she fell where the man found her. There's no question of someone having moved the body after she landed."

"I suppose you've talked to everyone who lives in the units?"

"At the moment we're concentrating on the units with balconies over where the body was found. The building has seven floors and four of the seven units we're interested in are vacant. There's no sign of a forced entry. Even if somebody'd let themselves in with a key we'd know about it."

"What about the other three units?"

"The other three are units 15, 21 and 27. Unit 15 is owned by a retired art teacher - an old gal of about 70. She was at home all evening and had been watching television from six o'clock until we called at her unit about 9.45. She saw nothing and she heard nothing."

"Is her hearing good?"

"It seemed all right. We didn't have to shout at her to make ourselves heard."

"Where was the television set in relation to the balcony?"

"She had curtains pulled over the door leading from the living room to the balcony and the television set was in front of the curtains. Nobody could have used that balcony tonight without her knowing."

"I see. Now, what about the other two units?"

"A young couple lives in 21 and they were at a party in unit 17. That's on the opposite side of the building from the courtyard. When the Inspector and I called they'd both been there ever since the party started. That was about eight o'clock."

"I suppose they had plenty of witnesses?"

"A whole roomful. Of course we'll check their story to make sure neither of them slipped away from the party. The Inspector and I had a look over their unit and there's no sign that anyone'd forced entry and they both say that nothing seems to have been stolen or disturbed. Just the same I suppose they are possibilities."

Hodgkins granted sceptically. "What about 27?"

"The occupant of 27 is a Mr

"So they say I'm rushed up as a surgeon, huh? Well, by Jove, I'll show them!"

Australia's earliest shipwreck

THE FIRST EUROPEAN SHIP known to have visited Australia was the Dutch merchantman Duyfloo, commanded by Willem Jansz, who visited the western coast of the Cape York peninsula in 1606.

But at least one European crew may have sighted Australia half a century or more earlier - and failed to return to report their discovery.

In 1626, the remains of an ancient ship were found on the coast of Victoria near the western end of Bass Strait. The ship appeared to have been a high-sided galleon, probably of Portuguese or Dutch origin.

The wreck was called the "Malgosy Ship", after the hard-wooding timber of which it was built. Its condition suggested that it had been slowly decaying there for more than a century.

Experts believe that the "Malgosy Ship" may have run aground there some time in the 16th Century, years before the Duyfloo's voyage - making its doomed, forgotten crew the first Europeans to see Australia.

Pigot — an American. He's something to do with the American Consulate."

Hodgkins' eyebrows rose a fraction.

"I know what you're thinking, just because Tyler had an American accent there might be some connection between them."

"That wasn't quite what I had in mind — but go on."

"Pigot says he was playing cards all evening with a friend who lives in unit 29."

"Just the two of them?"

"Yes."

"And what time did the card game begin?"

"About six o'clock — so they say."

"The fellow he was playing cards with — is he an American, too?"

"Yes. They both work at the American Consulate."

Hodgkins nodded his head thoughtfully.

Donald continued. "Of course it's possible that someone took the pad up on to the roof and threw her down from there — the door from the fire-escape to the roof was never locked."

Hodgkins looked unconvinced. "They'd have to open her a pretty good sort of story to get her up there, especially if she'd been mixed up in the blackmail business. She'd be pretty much on her guard, particularly if she knew someone had murdered her partner."

"But she might never have known Tyler was dead. After all, he was talked only the previous evening and she might not have had daily contact with him. It didn't make the papers and it was only on one radio broadcast that I know of."

Hodgkins stretched his legs. "There's one way this whole matter could be cleared up very quickly."

"It's one of two things — either the great god of the inner earth, Tlaloque, is angry with our last virgin sacrifice, or the enormous pressure of formation of molten rock is breaking through a weak spot in the earth's crust."

"Oh? And how's that?"

"Take Mr James with you to the block of units and introduce him to Mr Pigot and his friend."

Donald boggled. "But just because Pigot and the other blokes have American accents..."

Hodgkins cut in. "Donald, I've made a suggestion. I can't compel you to act upon it. You must please yourself."

Donald slumped his head down on the arms of the sofa. "OK," he said, and reached for the phone.

Fifteen minutes later, as Hodgkins reached to put out the lamp beside his bed, a car horn sounded in front of the house. He glanced at the alarm clock. It was 11 pm. He heard Donald leave, closing the front door quietly behind him.

In the darkness Hodgkins worked to himself.

At 5 am the doorbell rang.

Hodgkins pulled on his dressing gown as he shuffled down the hall to open the door. On the threshold stood Donald, Inspector O'Hare and a tall man wearing dark glasses and carrying a long, white stick.

Inspector O'Hare, a short, thick-set man with bull-dog face, seized Hodgkins' hand in a powerful grip and wrung it vigorously. "Good to see you again, Mr Hodgkins. Been keeping well?"

"Sorry I had to wake you, Dad," said Donald, "but I forgot my key. This is Mr James."

"Good morning, Inspector — good morning, Mr James. I judge from the looks on your faces that your efforts haven't been in vain."

Donald nodded. "Things turned

Soil turned wood to stone

When an old fence was being pulled down near Cooma some years ago, the workmen found that all the wood of the posts which lay below ground level was turned to stone.

Apparently there is some chemical quality in the soil in the locality which has this strange effect on wood. (RMC) Scientists have discovered that some telegraph poles around Cooma have been similarly affected, and so have some old telegraph poles on the road between Cooma and Goulburn.

An old grave near Cooma was opened some time back so that the remains could be removed to another cemetery, and it was found that the coffin had partly turned to stone.

Around the same time, the bodies of some British soldiers who had died in colonial wars were exhumed from the old Goulburn cemetery to be sent to England for reburial. The bodies were found to be in an excellent state of preservation, although they had been buried for more than 50 years.

out pretty well — but not so well for Mr Puggot!"

"Oh Mr Puggot's friend," the Inspector added.

"So he was in it too, was he?" said Hodgson, leading the way inside.

"Up to his eyeballs," said Donald. "It was being blackmailed too."

Emma came in from the hall, wrapped her dressing-gown about her. "Goodness! Do you know it's only five o'clock? Good morning, Inspector. We haven't seen you for months. Where have you all been at this hour?"

"We just put a pair of murderers behind bars," said the Inspector with satisfaction. "Now, Mr Hodgson, I think you owe us an explanation."

"Haven't they confessed?" Hodgson asked.

"Not yet, but we've got them cold. After Mr James recognized Puggot's voice we searched both their units and found them." The Inspector drew from under his jacket pocket a plain, brown-paper envelope and tossed it onto the coffee table.

Hodgson opened the envelope and drew out a number of photographs and two negatives. There were two different photos, three prints of each, showing two men in advanced stages of undress engaged in love-making with a young woman, similarly undressed.

"We found two strands of nylon from the girl's pant-hose caught on the rough cement top of the wall surrounding the balcony of Puggot's unit," the Inspector said. "It must have caught them when they tipped her over. Now, Mr Hodgson, why were you so sure that one of the Americans had been involved in Tyler's murder and why did you think the girl would be killed?"

"How do you spell 'round'?"

Hodgson scratched his head thoughtfully. "I wasn't certain, you know. I only thought it probable. There were certain aspects of Donald's description of Mr James' encounter with Tyler that interested me. First of all, there was the incident where Mr James stumbled against Tyler's knees as he sat in the armchair. It struck me as odd that a blind man who presumably has had considerable experience gauging a person's distance from his voice should be so clumsy."

Mr James agreed. "It's certainly not like me to do a thing like that. Usually I can judge a man's distance to the inch."

Hodgson continued. "Then there was the time discrepancy. Mr James said he left Tyler's room after 8.30, but the police doctor said Tyler was dead at eight. Are you quite sure you didn't make a mistake, Mr James?"

"Quite sure," James said emphatically, "because as soon as I returned to my room I turned on the radio for the concert hour. The program began at 8.30 and it had already started."

"Thank you, Mr James," said Hodgson. "When you went wrong, Donald, as I pointed out at the time, was in assuming that the murderer must be one of the men in the pictures made the strong-box. I grant you that the box was found locked in its hiding place and the key was under the carpet, and both of them carried the fingerprints only of the dead man. But your assumption that the killer hadn't opened the strong box restricted the range of suspects to only three people — the three men in the photos."

"Now, bearing in mind that Tyler had moved there only the previous day, and that he'd taken some pains to remain anonymous, it was unlikely that anyone could call on him unless he wanted them to."

VENGEANCE VIGIL

Someone had spread the word around that Mal Archer was coming to Leriet, and he saw that the same trap that had finished Jeff McLeod was being prepared for him.

FICTION / PETER NORCROSS

AS MAL ARCHER jangled across the porch of the Leriet post office, he realized he was being closely scrutinized by a slit-eyed gnat with a mutilated ear, who sat humped in a tilted chair on the veranda of the adjoining building which housed the Sumatone Bar. But Archer gave no sign of having noticed and strode on into the post office.

At the sound of his jangling spurs crossing the floor, a girl came to the window marked "General Delivery." The big rider swept his shapless eyebrows from his tawny brown head and took the girl in with frank admiration in his eyes. She had high-piled coppery hair, full red lips with tiny dimples at the corners, soft hazel eyes as clear as a pool beneath a willow, but shadowed, Mal thought, by a vague uneasiness.

He could see she was sizing him up for exactly what he appeared to be — six-foot-two of leathery cowboy, dusty and well-worn. A lazy smile softened the fierceness of his steel-gray eyes, broke the rugged lines of his tawny face, exposed gleaming white teeth in a wide good-humored mouth.

A warm flush spreading upward from the girl's neck relieved the pallor of her small face. Her face too revealed something more than casual interest. She lifted long silky lashes requiringly.

"Mal Archer in the name," the lanky stranger said.

If he had said "Judge Lucernot" the girl's expression couldn't have altered more quickly. There was tightening around her lips and eyes. Her oval face paled again. When she sorted through a bundle of letters and handed one out Archer caught the trembling of her hand. Then he caught something else — an opening and closing of both eyes while her gaze was not on him, but past his shoulder. He whirled.

Barry did he catch a glimpse of a face at the street window — the slit-eyed face of the man with the mutilated ear. He whirled back. The friendliness was gone now from his gray eyes.

"Why did you signal to that gun-dog who I am?" he asked flatly.

The girl's hazel eyes were panic-stricken. Her face flushed and paled. Then her little pointed chin came up. But when she spoke, her red lips quivered.

"Reader being impudent," she said thinly, "you must be loco!"

She reached up above the window and released a catch. A wooden blind dropped in front of Mal's nose with a bang. He stood there for a minute listening to the girl's footsteps fading at the rear, then with a twisted grin on his haggard face he cut-footed to the door with his sneaky right hand hovering over the scarred gun-butt on his right thigh.

The slit-eyed man had vanished. Mal knew there was no use searching for him — not now. He swung along the street and shouldered into a Chinese cafe.

Supper time had passed. The cafe was deserted. Mal went back and sat down in a corner, facing the door. While he waited, he read his letter.

Don't take a chance on coming openly to the Learning G. 12 miles due west of town. Ride south four miles. Swing west into Big Couder and follow it — a mile you pass the mouth of Little Bear Creek and hit two big boulders with a boulder between them come four miles due north to the spread

MOSS GOODNIGHT

A fat Chinese with a face like a full moon set down a bowl of soup and patterned back to the kitchen. Mal read the letter through carefully a second time, then torn it and the envelope into small squares and stuffed them into the steaming soup. The Chinese brought the rest of his supper. While he ate he thought, wondered too if he would ever finish that meal.

Mal Archer was a top-hand with the New Mexico Cattleman's Association. For reasons he never talked about, he hated all outlaws worse than scorpions on his shirt tail.

A week ago a telegram had come to headquarters in Santa Fe from Moss Goodnight urgently requesting a man. The entire Leriet Basin was being rigidly stripped of cattle by a band of thieves nobody could uncover. A secret meeting of the cattlemen had been held and the action decided upon.

Goodnight went on to say that Jeff McLeod, town marshal, had been murdered by the rustlers — shot in the back. That's what made Norcross ask for the best friend Mal ever had. When Mal thought of Little Jeff, as loyal a saddlemate as ever a man rode the river with, cold rage chilled his heart.

Mal Archer was detailed. Moss Goodnight was telegraphed to that effect and instructed to have a letter containing details waiting in the post office.

"And here I am," mused Archer. "But instead of being under cover, I'm most likely beamed in right now by a ring of paralytics. Somebody ran a whisker on me though that Vision of Delight in the post office. And where does the horn hit?" He shook his massive head mournfully. "And she seemed so sweet!" Then he got an idea.

Once whoever was behind all this had learned that a man had been sent for, that the man coming was "Mal Archer," and that a letter would be waiting for him, it was only necessary to post a lookout at the post office to watch strangers calling for mail, and get a signal from the girl when the right one blew in. And that information could have been received from but one source — a tip-off on the telegrams.

Big Mal Archer banged a silver dollar on the table and slid to his feet. The Chinese was lighting his lamps. Mal was surprised to see that night had fallen. He stepped out into the darkness, then slid sideways. Out of the corner of his eye he caught the glint of lamplight on a gun barrel in the black shadow beside the gnarled trunk of a cottonwood tree.

In such a light, Mal Archer acted first and thought afterward. The spot of flame from the tree trunk was a shade behind snatching his own. He threw himself sideways. A slug snarled past his cheek. When no second shot came, he darted for the tree.

A man lay huddled in the dust. Archer rolled him over and stowed him around to get his face in the light. It was the gambler with the mutilated ear. He had another mutilation now — a gaping hole through his neck.

Men came plunging from doorways all along the dirty lit street. Remembering what he was here for, Archer knew he must make a quick getaway. But the dying dry-gulcher was snatching. Mal dropped on one knee and put an ear down to his lips.

"He was chain lightning", Crow-

"I suppose if you had your way, you'd get a divorce and artificial turf."

ley?" wrenched the gunny. Then he died.

Booted feet were thudding on the plank walks. Men were yelling hoarsely. Mal leaped into the narrow opening between the cafe and the store next door, and from there faded into the blackness of an alley. There was no talking if his getaway had been soon.

"Crowley! Crowley!" he kept muttering, then recalled where he had seen that name. It was in black letter on a galvanised sign he had noticed when he rode into town — Crowley's Billiard Room.

"That don't make sense," he thought as he ran. "There ain't no law in Lorain since Little Jeff was back-shot, and most likely Crowley wants it should stay that way. But if Crowley is the man behind all this, he knows I ain't no brownie come to clean up his town. But—" he crashed over an ash can, leaped to his feet and ran on—"if Crowley is the boss ruffler in these parts, that would make sense."

The dopey little telegraph agent was dozing at his desk when something woke him up with a start — Archer's gun muzzle in the ribs.

"The name is Mal Archer," the big fellow said distinctly. "Before I drill a circle of holes around your belly button, I want to know who tipped you off I was coming."

"I didn't tell nobody!" quavered the cowering agent.

"It ain't good for your soul to lie," advised Archer "but just before going to hell anyhow, I know you told somebody. My question is who? Quick!"

The terrified agent dropped on his knees beside his desk and stuck both hands in the air. "If you promise not to kill me," he hissed, "I'll talk."

"She's a deal," grunted Mal Archer. "Talk."

"I stole 140 one time," hissed the agent, "and I got found out. From then on I've had to show every one, or go to the pen, mister. I'm a sick man, I'd die!"

"Who do you show the wint' to?" demanded Mal.

"Tom Padway," pleaded the agent. "It was from his back I stole the 140."

The tall terror to cattle thieves left the agent groveling on the floor and strode through the darkness to the feed stable where he had left his gun. He was settling his big Remington saddle on Slumberback's strong back when the little stableman came sobbing out of a stall leading a mare that made Archer stop dead.

"I don't wonder, cowboy," checked the stableman. "This here's the finest piece of palomino horse-flesh in the Basin. She's a queen, and she is rode by a queen."

"I have found considerable knives in this half-hole," said Archer, "but not a queen."

"You would," affirmed the heavy-man, "if you looked in the post office. Miss Mary Randall, she owns the mare." He grabbed a comb and brush. "Miss Mary will be in right soon. Works" daytime, she mostly does her ride" at night."

Mal rode out the back door of the stable and out of town by back ways, then struck south as he had been told by Goodnight. His thoughts were rumbled. Too many folks were getting hogged in this pen. He better learn what Moss Goodnight had to say.

Tom Padway might or might not be hooked up with Crowley. Padway got copies of all telegrams. Mal suddenly remembered that he had been grossly careless in one respect — he had failed to see if this letter had been steamed open.

Mary Randall might be the whole show. The gun with the burn scar might have been a handman of hers, not Crowley's. The words he mumbled while dying could have been in distress. The telegraph agent could deny he had said a word. Mal realized he hadn't a shred of evidence that wouldn't need the testimony of a dead man.

When he judged he was nearing Big Coulee he looked back. Perhaps half a mile behind him, silhouetted for moment on a ridge, a lone rider appeared, then dipped again into darkness. The big rider heaver flicked Slumberback with the spur.

When he reached the mouth of the coulee, he swung the big gridding in and quickly caught him in a clump of red-thorn. Then he went back to the mouth of the wash and hid in a rock pile, listening subconsciously to the red night because whispering through the chaparral. At the sound of hoofbeats, his gun slid into his hand.

The lone rider wheeled into the coulee mouth and passed within 15 feet of Archer's hiding place at a long lunge. When Mal saw who it was, he felt a prickly sensation at the roots of his hair. It was a girl in a side-saddle, mounted on a tall palomino. It was too dark to see the girl's face. But the big Association man didn't need to be told who she was.

Quickly getting Slumberback, Mal let the first gridding stretch out till he detected a first blur in the darkness ahead, then drew in short.

His first thought was to overtake the girl and demand a showdown. Then it struck him that the girl hadn't hesitated at the coulee mouth. She couldn't possibly have seen his tracks. If she was trailing him, it must be because she knew he would go that way. And if she knew that, his letter had been opened.

A new thought came to him. What if old Moss Goodnight himself were in on the deal? He had known such men — where a rctrope marked his identity by posing as the leader of honest men. Then Archer got another surprise.

After another mile, the dark blur ahead suddenly vanished. Mal went ahead cautiously. At the mouth of a shallow draw that bore upward to the northwest, the ring of hoofs on rock stopped him. Far up in that draw he heard the dwindling clatter. Mary Randall wasn't on his trail at all. She had sped away on some mysterious trail of her own.

Again, Mal's first action was to

Australia's fine kelpie sheepdogs

WELL-TRAINED. HARD-WORKING sheepdogs have always been important to the Australian wool industry, and in the last century dogbreeders went to a lot of trouble developing dogs for the work.

The world's first sheepdog trials were held at Forbes, NSW, in 1871. The winner at Forbes was a crossbred bitch named Kelpie, one of the founders of Australia's famous kelpie breed.

The name kelpie is believed to have come originally from one of the Forbes winner's ancestors, a fox-colour bitch named Kelp. This dog was imported from Scotland by John King, of Mangrove Creek, Saratton, Illago, as long ago as 1828.

The kelpie breed was valuable to sheep farmers because the dogs were very intelligent and could be thoroughly trained in their work. Two brothers named Kew and another dog-breeder named Mulcaid dominated the Australian sheepdog trials for more than 20 years following 1890.

At trials and shows, these breeders used to demonstrate the excellent working qualities of their kelpies by "blinding the checker". The dogs were trained to control a loose chicken and drive it into a pen on and her. But he decided against it. In the first place, he'd probably lose her in the darkness. And he was becoming more and more curious to make talk with Moss Goodnight. With the murder of Little Jeff McLeod growing at his heart, he pointed Stumbehead west through the corral.

The rising moon was filling the big yard on the Leaning G with pale white light when he rode in. He spotted a light in a kitchen window, then quitted off a pack of snapping hounds. A long-bearded oldster threw the door wide and came hobbling toward him.

"You Moss Goodnight?" asked Archer.

"Grizzly," snapped old Goodnight, "who told you Moscho was shot by Mal Archer?"

The guest's feet trembled in the gravel. "I disremember, boss," he said soun'ly. "Reck'n I heard it in the Britannia Bar."

"Light down, young fellow," insisted old Moss. "We can talk more comfortable inside. Grizzly will look to your sorrel."

As the early morn'g turned to lead the horse away, Mal caught the evil light in his reddish eyes.

While Moss Goodnight stomped around rinsing up some hot coffee, Archer stood him up in the lamplight, but couldn't make much of him. He Archer riveted his staid eyes on the oldster's bearded face. "I told but one person - that was when I asked for my mail."

The old man's white eyelids fluttered. "That's out," he growled. "Miss Mary, she is of the salt of the earth. She come West three-four years back to try and get her lad together off the booze. Bess since then she has not only shifted for herself but for that weak-kneed brother of hers too, Mary, she is plumb loco over that whiskey-gutted pup, hoping eternally to salvage him from the devil."

"The devil," hazarded Archer, "being Crowley?"

"Nops," contradicted the oldster. "Duke Crowley won't sell Leary a drop. But let's get down to cases. He showed his cup aside and stuffed a load of cut-pug into a charged corral."

"This whole Lanet Basin is being combed clean of phone cattle by some crew of long-riders we can't even get a finger on," he resumed. "We've had several brushes with the damn wolves, killed two-three vinegroves nobody recognized - but who the boss be, we don't know."

"It wouldn't be Duke Crowley," asserted Archer laudly, "or Tom Padway, would it?"

Old Moss Goodnight hunched all the tears run down into his whiskers. "Hell's hogwads!" he spat out. "That land-hound of a Crowley would skin you out of your eye teeth in a minute game, but Duke's got his hands full acting as self-appointed Mayor of Larin. As for Padway, Tom's mawner's a cross-eyed scamp and creekender's the back of a cow, but there ain't enough of him to be a hooster. Besides which, young feller, did I overlook telling you the rumored of this pack of wolves is a woman?" And at Mal's expression of unbelief he added, "A six women ride a side-saddle!"

Big Mal Archer had heard of such a thing. But, if true in this case, it was the first time he had encountered it. His thoughts flew to Mary Randall as he had first seen her - coppery hair, smiling lips, and soft hand eyes. Then he saw her as he had seen her last - flying off to the southwest on a young palomino, and mounted on a side-saddle.

"Got any idea?" he asked, "where these hoosters hide out?"

"Not any," grumbled old Moss. "There's been a crew of birds with prize tags on their hair up in Ballpore Meadows for several years, but them fellows ain't never bothered us down here in the Basin."

Great cattle drives of the overlanders

GREAT OVERLAND CATTLE DRIVES are as much a part of Australia's tradition and history as they are of America's. Australian cattlemen have to cope with conditions - heat, dust, drought and distance - which are the most difficult in the world.

The first "overlanders" in Australia were John Gardiner, Joseph Hendon, John Hepburn and George Hinchelbrook. These partners took a herd of cattle from the Murray River to the Port Phillip district in 1837.

The first mob of cattle to be overlanded from Queensland to the Kimberleys in northern Australia made the journey in 1888. The team overlander was Nathaniel Buchanan, a partner in the founding of the first cattle station west of the overland telegraph. His wife was the first whose women to travel to the west of the Park Downs.

Australia's longest stock route is the Goring route, running 870 miles from Hall's Creek to Wiluna in Western Australia. Nowadays it is almost unused.

"All except one leg," grumbled the old man. "It's second-growth back'ry, damn it! You're the young whipper-snapper the Association sent, eh?"

"You know a heap of things, words?" inquired Mal laudly.

"I tell you easy does it," grumbled old Goodnight, "and Grizzly Posack, my segundo, slopes in from Lanet and tells me you started right in to work the town over by killing Moscho Spear, one of my own cow?"

Mal's mind was working like a trip-hammer. "Who told your segundo," he asked calmly, "that the girl who shot Spear was me?"

"Hanged if I know," growled the oldster irritably. He stuck two fingers through his whiskers and gave a shrill whistle.

A lumbering ghost of a man loomed from the doorway of a vlogs bunkhouse and came floundering across the gravel. Mal got a good look at his face in the moonlight - the darkly glowing face of a man born as a th-thunder.

was a hawk-eyed old wolf of a man, hony and stooped, with icy butter-milk eyes and a jaw that clamped like a door hinge.

"How come you, Archer," he snapped, glancing through the steam from his coffee, "to gun down one of my boys?"

"I was coming out of the Chin'ka," Mal explained, "when this coyote you call 'Spear' threw down on me from behind a tree. I didn't miss."

"Hell's hogwads!" swore old Moss. "One hombre don't throw down on another for no reason whatever."

"That's puzzling me some too," Mal admitted. "Has this struck you, Goodnight? If nobody knewed I was in town, how come anybody to know Spear was gunned by me?"

Old Moss' faded blue eyes shifted thoughtfully. "I reckon," Moscho probably talked some before he caved in. But if, like you say, you told nobody who you was, how would Moscho know?"

Tank Breakout

The Allies had driven the Nazis out of Normandy. But they still had to crack the great shield of the German armored formations around the beach-head.

FACT / LEN GUTTRIDGE

"THREE TIGERS at the crossroads," snapped Lieutenant Chip Kroske of the US Second Armored Division. "Let's go get the bastards."

Commanding the leading Sherman, he had spotted the German Mark VI tanks through field glasses from his open hatch. Kroske pressed his A-ent mike switch again, rapped attack orders to the column of tanks following.

"Don't try to take any of 'em from the front," he warned. "Sneak up and hit 'em on the flanks."

By German standards the Sherman tank was as good as obsolete, easily equaled by the Mark IV and in a straight fight at anything over pointblank range, no match at all for either the Mark V Panthers or Mark VI Tigers. But the close nature of the Normandy battleground had robbed the Germans of some of the advantages of their powerful tank armament. Moreover, thanks to American ingenuity hedgecrows were no longer impenetrable barriers.

"Okay, all tank commanders," barked Kroske. "Off the road."

The column split and veered left and right, tank drivers gunning for the hedgecrows seven feet high and just as thick that bordered open meadow. Driving the lead tank with "Hitler's Hearse" dashed on the bow, Corporal Stanley Waco sneezed, wishing his head would quit throbbing. The intercom phones always gave him a headache.

Right now though, Waco was more conscious of the fierce tension building in his guts. Same with the others. They were a slow as an ant on an as any average Second Armored "Hell on Wheels" rookie with a couple of weeks' combat training at Ford Benning or Camp Peck, but none of them had tasted real war so far.

Waco shifted his seat of chewing gum, throttled the engines to « rear and Hitler's Hearse layaged at the solid-looking hedgecrows.

Eight steel teeth welded to the Sherman's front-end bit deep into the hedgecrows roots. Soil and tangled underbrush split and loomed. Tank treads grinding, the 31-ton Sherman bulldozed through the barrier. Then Hitler's Hearse was converging, along with the other four, on the herd of Nazi Tigers clustered at the Trévy-Villebeuden crossroads.

Waco's co-driver, Private Todd Lamont, threaded the end of an ammo belt through the receiver of the bow machine-gun, yanked back twice on the bolt to throw a shell into the chamber. Lamont squinted into the periscope. Dirty gray mist. Mottled vision, then cleared to reveal bomb-blasted hedgecrows gaps 90 yards ahead and glimpses of two stationary Tigers, one of them with gun turret rotating to bring its huge 88 mm cannon to bear on the approaching Yanks.

"Listen, tank commanders," rasped Lieutenant Kroske's voice. "Don't stay long in one place. Keep moving. Don't let 'em draw a bead on you." Then Kroske was rooting off directions to his own crew.

Just below Kroske crouched his gunner, Corporal Joe Fern, sweating face pressed against the foam rubber pad of his telescope eyepiece, fists closed tight on the twist-grips of the power-traverse, foot poised above the firing pedal. The telescope gave him a small, concentrated field of vision. He couldn't sight the target and knew nothing about the snipe used Kroske's urgent voice briefed him in official fire-order sequence.

Waco's vision was restricted too. All he could do was instinctively obey Kroske's harsh commands. "Year left, driver. That's enough, straight now. Slow down, halt." Then quickly to Joe Fern. "Traverse right. Steady. Two rounds. FIRE."

Down in the turret Fern kicked the pedal. The 75 recoiled, moved almost jerking Hitler's Hearse off its treads. A split second later Kroske swore. "Missed, goddammit." He issued new commands. Corporal Fern readjusted the 75's elevation and windage and the breach slammed shut as Milt Dobet, his loader, threw in another round.

Before Fern could fire again the Tiger's 88 flamed and Hitler's Hearse took thundering concussion from a near miss.

"Fire!" bawled Kroske. Inside, the Sherman's gun barrel recoiled a full 12 inches, sprung back into position, shell case clattering off the chute.

Kroske shouted "We lost the son of a bitch!"

The shell burst in the Tiger's side, flame spewed from a sudden gaping hole and the crew came popping out, two of them sprouting wings of fire.

Larson, the co-driver who doubled as bow gunner, began to pour tracers into the scattering Germans. First the pair of German tanks were put out of their agony

A third Nazi dropped squirming.

Suddenly the second Tiger loomed.

"Let's roll, big," Kroske began. "Driver, make a right and—"

He got no farther. The shell from an anti-tank gun lurking in the trees beyond the crossroads ripped through the top of the Sherman's turret and took his head off. It took only seconds for his crew to recover from the shock.

"You heard the skipper!" screamed old Joe Fern. "Let's move, it!" Blood sprayed down on him from Kroske's headless body slumped in the mangled turret.

As Waco gained the tank off right and ahead, Milt Dorba slipped in a third 75 mm round. Then Hitler's Heavies barreled straight for the Tigers, long gun pumping, loader ducking each hammerblow round, then jacking in a new shell, while up front Larson, gun-faced, kept the 30 calibre snarling until he stood ankle-deep in spent shells.

If the Tigers had deliberately advertised themselves to such the Sherman within range of the anti-tank batteries, no one had time to worry about it. Simultaneous hits from German tanks and the hidden guns turned one of the Shermans into a 32-ton molten tomb. Another splintered back on the highway smacked into a salvo of 88s and blossoming flame, it span in the middle of the road like a grooved super-car wheel. A third Sherman tapped an anti-tank mine which shattered its tracks and left it a monstrous cripple. Nazi artillery shells found it at once.

Two burning Tigers choked the crossroads. As Hitler's House lurched right at them, a German tank crewman stumbled blindly through swirling smoke and impaled himself on the Sherman's steel hedgehog outfall.

The undamaged Tigers turned tail, nosed off down the road Hitler's House, decapitated commander jack-knifed on the crumpled hatch and a skinned Nazi up front, crowned with a ching off one of the wrecked Tigers and took off after the fleeing Tigers. The only other Sherman still operating joined in and the crazy chase vanished south behind thickening smoke.

The date: July 29, 1944. Fourth day of Operation Cobra.

Almost eight weeks earlier the Allies had hit the Normandy beaches. Securing the beachheads formed phase one of the overall plan. Phase two, the big buildup, began immediately. By mid-July more than 54,000 tons of ammunition, fuel, and equipment were pouring across the English Channel every day. Soon Allied troops captured the major port of Cherbourg and any moment now the wrecked harbor would be restored, doubling the rate of cross-channel buildup.

But the Nazi High Command had swiftly recovered from the shock of D-Day. Adolf Hitler was basically optimistic. He had purged his top brass of defeatist elements. When Der Fuehrer heard that Field Marshal Karl Von Rundstedt had urged peace in the response to the Allied Normandy landing, he replaced him with Field Marshal Gerdner Von Kluge.

"You, my field marshal, will take command of the west," Hitler told him. "It will be your glorious task for the Fatherland to stop the Allied advance."

At first Von Kluge's hopes soared. All Allied thrusts had slowed. The British were temporarily stalled at Caen and General Omar Bradley's American troops had suffered fearful casualties in the drive along the Vire River to St. Lo.

The struggle for St. Lo left Bradley's troops exhausted. But to slacken off now might spell suicide for the entire Allied endeavor, which had already fallen behind schedule. In any event, the question was academic. Pressing on had now become a matter of logistic necessity. Incoming supplies were piling up behind the weary advance troops. By July 20 the bridgeheads back of St. Lo were committed to bunting point.

Pressure from Washington and London mounted, concentrating most intensely on General Omar Bradley. At an officers' conference in his command post trailer Bradley outlined the situation. Intelligence reports verified that the Germans had their armored reserves committed to a line of defense immediately in

The first of the furbies

THE EXPRESSION "FURPHY", meaning a rumor or unlikely, unconfirmed report, originated among the soldiers in Australian training camps in World War I.

John Furphy's furbies, established in Victoria in 1876, built metal-headed weapons which were used in the army camps for training purposes. The weapons were stamped with the bear's name, and eventually the name Furphy came to be identified with the furbies.

So a "furphy" report was one which was passed along by soldiers who gossiped there. Such a report, altered and incorporated with each telling, was almost bound to be incorrect.

John Furphy's brother Joseph embarked on a literary career, and wrote the classic Australian outback novel "Such Is Life". He published it under the pen-name "Tom Collins", and became famous henceforth under that name. Oddly enough, according to the bear stamp upon the name "Tom Collins" was staff a Furphy.

front of St Lo

"We can't seriously think of liberating Europe until we break out of here," Bradley scribbled a finger at the wall map of Normandy. "There is no time to lose, gentlemen. We've got to find a way to break through this damn crust."

Before the conference had ended, Operation Cobra was born — a plan worked out with the gaudy genius of General George Patton. The plan is a nutshell: soften the crust with massive air bombardment, then three infantry divisions under General Lawton Collins would hit the Germans on a 4000-yard front southwest of St Lo, forcing a gap through which the Second and Third Divisions could drive.

Once the gap was opened, Patton's Third Army tanks would pour through as a one-stop sweep that would encircle masses of cut-off Nazi positions, then race on for Paris. Scheduled jump-off date: July 25.

Meanwhile, Von Kluge was beefing up the defenders with battle-tested panzer divisions transferred from the Eastern battlefield. But the Field Marshal held no illusions about the terrible test confronting him and he even wrote to Hitler about it.

"I came here with the fixed determination of making effective your order to stand fast at any price. But in spite of intense efforts, the moment has drawn near when this front, already so heavily strained, will break."

Von Kluge knew the crunch was moment on July 25. Fighter-bombers of the Ninth US Air Force struck first at 0930. Then for 60 deafening minutes, Flying Fortresses and Liberators of Goodrich's Eighth Air Force saturated a rectangle four miles wide and 2500 yards deep with high explosives. Bombs accidentally fell on some of Lawton Collins' forward assault troops, killing scores of GIs, but the airborne onslaught had mangled effect on the enemy

"First, there is something that I've always wanted to try."

Nazi Panzer commander Fritz Bayerlein later: "The planes kept coming over as if on a conveyor belt. My tank had hardly opened its mouth when the batteries roared direct hits which knocked out half the guns and silenced the rest. By noon nothing was visible but dust and smoke. My front lines looked like the face of the moon and at least 70 percent of my troops were out of action — dead, wounded, crazed or stunned. All my forward tanks were knocked out."

Bayerlein pulled his battered troops back from the St Lo-Pontre road. Answering his desperate appeals for reinforcements, Von Kluge promised fresh tank battalions. At the same time, less than a dozen miles to the north, General Collins passed his infantrymen for the assault. The enemy crust had been softened. It wasn't yet broken!

Allied tacticians saw Cobra as signaling a new era in combat co-ordination. In the hectic 30-day period from the fall of Cherbourg to the launching of Cobra, Bradley's First Army had carried out an intensive program of experiment and retraining aimed at perfecting co-operation between tanks and infantry, fighter-bombers and armored columns. Now, Bradley believed, it was time for the payoff.

Then Cobra snowballed to a bad start. Some American units were still badly shaken up after the bombing they had suffered from their own planes. Spearhead units of the Ninth,

Patton

"Oh, no. Just two guys who couldn't decide who was next."

Fourth and Thirtieth Divisions driving south from the St Lo-Pierres road, ran headlong into a swarm of Panthers backed by half-burned Tigers, gun barrels piling above ground like steel pillboxes. The spearhead troops were cut to pieces.

Lawton Collins was a general dedicated to swift action. Under present plans the infantry was supposed to breach the bomb-softened enemy lines so Allied armor could race through and fan out south, east and west. In other words, the spearhead of the attempted breakthrough was made of infantry. Flesh and blood. And instead of penetrating the crisis, it was pulverizing itself against Panther steel. By dawn on July 26 only two miles had been gained along the route to the first objectives, St Gilles and Mammy.

Collins thought fast. Why not pit tank against tank? Sure, tank for tank and gun for gun the Germans could justifiably claim superiority. In head-on encounter the Panthers and Tigers had thicker armor and their 75s and 88s enjoyed the longer range. But the odds were leveled off in hedgerow country which ruled out long-distance engagements. There the Sherman's superior maneuverability in close combat was a potentially decisive factor.

And the Shermaine would go into action as versatile tank-builders, able to plow through hedgerows and forests at top-speed with the tank-like prong and sawtooth blades that could slash tangled roots and shoot through even 18-inch tree trunks.

—H. H. H.

"It's the second door to the right, and please hurry back so we can finish."

It took Lawton Collins little time to reach a decision. Switch plans. Unleash the tanks ahead of the infantry. Armor against armor. And it was still short of noon on July 26 when redeployment orders were flashed to US armored division commanders.

Collins had split his armored units into two main forces: Combat

Command A and Combat Command B. They both jumped off before midday and by mid-afternoon American tanks, half-tracks, and heavy 155 mm self-propelled artillery units were racing through a 25-mile corridor between the Vire River on the east and the English Channel to the west.

Bomb-crushed St Gilles and Mammy were quickly gobbled up and under a blazing sun the armored armada swept over debris-strewn highways. Infantrymen rode the outside of the tanks, broad, ready to leap off and into action with rifles and grenades should a Nazi machine-gun nest try to harass the column's progress.

In forest country at Cerny five miles northwest of St Lo the road ahead of the 67th Armored Regiment's leading tanks suddenly erupted in a storm of German bazooka bursts.

A task force of hitchhiking GIs jumped off the following tanks, plunged through trees, and crept up on the bazooka crew. Grinny they noted the weapon's size. Known as the Panzerschreck, the German version of the bazooka was twice the size of its American counterpart, and could blast a seven-pound missile through 4 inches of armor at 165 yards.

The GIs delayed the emplacement team with hand grenades and a machine-gun team got to within 50 feet and poured belt after belt into the Panzerschreck armor. The 67th roared on.

Queensland's peculiar lungfish

ONE OF AUSTRALIA'S strangest freshwater fish is the Queensland lungfish, which can survive in water or on land.

The lungfish, named Neoceratodus by scientists, was first discovered in the Mary and Burnett Rivers in North Queensland. It is a good swimmer, and has more recently been introduced into other streams further south.

The lungfish breathes air into a lung developed from a primitive "seven-bladder" it has to surface for breath every half hour or so, lifting the end of its snout out of the water and enjoying and filling its lung with a nervous soaring sound.

Scientists believe the lungfish became adapted to air breathing to help it survive in seasons of drought. By breathing air it could survive longer in a shrinking water hole, and shunting stuff out of the mud and wriggle over dry land to a larger pool.

The lungfish is long and thick-bodied, with mackerel, herring-like fins. It grows to about six feet in length, and lives to a great age.

Yank infantrymen perched on snoring-hot tanks, cursed the sun and sweated. The Nocturnid countryside reeked of death. The fields and bomb-flattened towns were total junkyards littered with wrecked armor and decomposing dead.

One of Collier's main spearheads was thrusting due south to cut the east-west highway between Tenny and the Channel coast. A battalion of the 66th Armored Regiment reached La Mognol Herman, its first strategic objective, at 0200 July 27. The Germans were waiting.

The battalion command half-track was shattered by 88s and only the outfit's CO and a machine gunner scrambled out alive. They mounted the back of a company commander's Sherman as its 75 belched at a pair of open-topped Tigers side by side 50 yards away.

Then the company commander suddenly roared, "Cease fire! Cease fire!" American infantrymen had slipped from the shadows and were swarming up the Tigers' sides, tossing grenades inside the tanks before the Germans could button up. As the 88s dried off and evaporated around the ruins, internal explosions all but bounced the Tigers off their tracks.

By dawn when the armored battalion clanked a further six miles and reached the vital crossroads near Villersbon, it had accounted for another five tanks, a self-propelled 88 mm gun, and six anti-tank guns. The battalion's progress had also cost it 300 killed and wounded.

Other armed spearheads had swung right, making for Courcieres near the coast. Moving fast now they were in the line to cut off the entire 84th German corps occupying the Cotentin Peninsula. Reacting to this threat Von Kluge rushed the 2nd and 17th SS Panzer Divisions into Normandy under Fritz Bayerlein's overall command. His orders: "Stop the Americans at all costs!"

A powerful new Jagdpantzer squatting on the blacktop west of Manngy was positioned to do just that as Battery B of the US 480th Armored Anti-Aircraft Battalion came rumbling out of the ruined town. The Germans' 88 mm gun was already belching and even if the American gunners placed their round smack on target, no hardware in their arsenal was able to pierce the Jagdpantzer's 80-millimetre-thick frontal plate.

The American mobile battery opened up anyway. Under a cascade of flying shells, Captain Phil Shaw, Battery B's commander, led three men on foot, zig-zagging right up under the nose of the 48-ton monster tank. Working fast they studded its boggy wheels with TNT packages. When the Nazi's turret popped open, out of curiosity Shaw grabbed the chance to drop a grenade inside.

Suddenly the big tank was dancing under the impact of internal and external explosions. Blooded and half-asked, three of the German crew squirmed out and a dozen Americans ganged up on them, one inexorably brandishing an axe. Two German crewmen were captured. The third shrieked "Heil Hitler", and shot himself in the head.

To avoid entrapment the German 84th Corps would have to push south across the Sasse River. Allied armor raced south-west with the object of beating them to the bridge.

The highway led through Notre Dame, where Fritz Bayerlein's Panzer Lehr had conscripted stuff in the surrounding country and was all set to pounce. Unaware of this, Colonel Richard Nelson led an advance guard of the 67th Armored Regiment through the ruined main street, upright in his tank turret and taking pot-shots with a Webley pistol at scattering German infantrymen.

"You've got a problem, Ralph."

BEST BAIT

I reckoned Mac was stealing my crayfish, and it looked like he was stealing my wife too. He'd have to go . . .

FICTION / J. EDWARD BROWN

"I SHOULD NEVER have come to this goddamned hole," Noelen shouted. "I must have been mad. There's nothing to do, nobody to talk to except the cat and fishermen."

We were in our carmen. Noelen was only two feet away from me. Her shouting was deafening.

"You'd rather live like Mac, in a pigsty," she told me.

That wasn't true. I like to be comfortable, that's why I'd imported the carmen to this fishing camp on the Chatham Islands at great expense. It was warm, clean. But Noelen was homebound. I was supposed to take my gunboats off at the door. But I hadn't tonight and I'd brought in sand again. She swept it up with a brush.

"Mac would appreciate a nice comfortable clean carmen like this," Noelen said.

How did Mac's name get into this? "It seems to me you're always quoting Mac lately," I said angrily.

And suddenly I knew. Those knowing looks between Mac and her. Things I'd overheard.

"You should have married a clerk who went a suit to the office every day, not a fisherman," I said, suddenly much quieter. "Why don't you go home to your mother?"

"I will," she mumbled.

She always said she would, but she never did.

I was after crayfish — lobsters, the Americans call them. It was easy work and big dough. But it was no life for a woman. The nearest piece of civilization was 40 miles away, and that was Waitangi where there was only a pub and a general store, and then it was 500 miles west across the Pacific to New Zealand.

She'd been at this fishing camp for two years. It was lonely for her. Though she had the cat for company, a pedagogue Siamese. Perhaps next Christmas we'd go back to the mainland for a short holiday. Have ourselves a good time. She deserved a break.

"Only another year," I said.

"That's what you say every year."

"If my boat hadn't been wrecked."

"It," she said angrily.

"The price of crayfish has gone up again this year. I'll clear $10,000. It'll put me back on my feet."

"You must have enough now. You're never satisfied." She slammed the aluminum door of the carmen behind her. I could see her walking around the curve of the beach towards the wreck of my concrete boat. Maybe it symbolized the wreckage of our marriage.

The boat had broken her mood—days one night in a gale and gone up on the beach and been pounded to pieces. I had lost 120,000 that night — and no insurance. But that was the risk of fishing in a remote place like the Chatham Islands.

I went over to Mac's hut. He hadn't been stupid enough to get married. He had his feet up on the table, a bottle of beer open, and he was reading an old magazine. The hut was crudely built — a rough bunk, a rough table, rudder on the wall, a heated gas stove, lamp shades made of one gallon paint tins cut down, a big bed net.

"I thought I heard my name mentioned," he said cheerfully.

"Was it?" I said. "You're lucky you never got married!"

He grinned at me. He went to Waitangi once a month maybe and got drunk. There were a few girls around.

I looked around at his disordered place. "She's so bloody clean, that's the trouble," I said.

He passed me a dirty glass and I poured myself a beer.

I'd had the carmen shipped across to the island and then lifted into place with the helicopter which loaded and unloaded the cray boats in the bay. It was the envy of the whole population. The few other married people lived in rough huts made of scrap lumber, nothing comfortable about them.

But I had other problems. "Somebody has been lifting my pots, stealing my crayfish," I told Mac.

"If you haven't got any pots nobody can steal crays from them," Mac said. He grinned, he was a skunkster. "I pick my crays straight off the bottom."

"Own nothing, not even a woman," I said.

But my pots seemed to have been the hardest hit. Nobody knew who had been doing it, though I had an idea it was Mac with his underwater gear. Captive crayfish were easier to catch than those crawling free on the ocean floor. And Mac sagged widely in his search while we more conventional pot fishermen stayed in our own particular area.

"Something will have to be done about this thief," I said seriously. "And one day we'll catch him."

"What will happen to him?" Mac asked.

"If I catch him, I'll feed him to the fish," I said.

Mac laughed and opened a bottle of whisky. We got on to the subject of women, as usual.

"It's a wonder there hasn't been trouble here with the few women and the crowd of men," Mac said.

"Why should there be? The women are all married."

He laughed. "They're the worst. Oh, Noelen excepted of course."

"Does that business go on around here?" I asked as nervously as possible.

"So I hear," he said.

"A husband must feel a nag when he finds out."

"Yeah," he said, and he grinned — too weakly. "If he ever finds out," he passed the bottle.

I was sure now.

We drank the bottle between us and I staggered back to the caravan very late and tuffed the cat off my side of the bunk. That was another thing — the cat didn't make friends, it only allowed itself to be approached by Noelen and me — and lately Mac.

* * *

Things weren't much better in the morning.

"Will you be away overnight?"

Noelen snapped

"Yes."

She moved the bowl of artificial fruit to the window. There was no real fruit on this stand; I had heard a cheap farmer grow apples in a sheltered orchard, but I had never seen them.

Mac was going past. He saw the fruit and he almost smiled at Noelen before he saw me. Did I interpret the look correctly? I think I did.

"Just what do you mean Henry by 'That's the way the cookie crumbles'?"

Anyway, I knew I was going to get Mac.

If Mac's boat didn't come back, everybody would understand. It had a rusted skip and the company wanted 75 dollars to ship it, but he was too lazy to get it done. He'd also been having trouble with a salt water cooling line. The pipe had rusted through and he'd repaired it temporarily with a piece of rubber hose pipe. If that was removed the boat would fill up, and he'd be drowned.

It was a shame to dissolve a good friendship because of a woman. But poaching a woman was as bad as poaching crayfish pots. I put on my parka and gumboots, and slithered the caravan down behind me.

The camp was a lonely rough place, rusty crayfish pots, red and yellow plastic floats, the man's wooden mess hut, the big corrugated iron furnace, flux and sand, mountains of empty oil drums, the roar of the sea, the roar of the diesel engine supplying power to the packing company freezer, and the stink of fish used as bait.

No, it was no place for a woman, especially a good-looking gal like Noelen. There was nothing for her to do in the caravan except clean it. But a man got lonely. I'd been here a year before I'd brought Noelen over.

Then I put those thoughts out of my mind. Mac was a poacher. And he was going to get what he deserved.

I sniffed the air as I rowed out. It was fresh and clean out in the bay. It was a pity a man had to go ashore, I thought.

"It's a pleasure trip for me and a business trip for her."

Sydney's aboriginal rock-carvings

THE OLD ABORIGINAL ROCK-CARVINGS in the area around Sydney and the Hunterbury River in New South Wales make up one of the finest examples of primitive art in the world.

Using no written language, the Aborigines cut their tribal records into stone faces on selected parts of their tribal territory. Some of the carvings have been made in the last few centuries, but others in the area are estimated to be several thousand years old.

Hundreds of the carvings have been discovered, and more are being found every year. Most are representations of a few individuals, but some show groups of a hundred or more.

Most of the carvings are life-sized, but some are miniature, and some are of figures more than 60 feet long. Some show half-human, half-animal creatures of Aboriginal mythology.

The Aborigines made the carvings by drawing a picture on the rock with a burnt stick, and then scratching on the flint with a sharp-pointed piece of stone. The most popular locations were in caves and cliff overhangs, along river banks and creek beds and on rock platforms.

Kangaroos and wallabies are the animals most often shown. The kangaroo is the commonest reptile, and the tree is the commonest bird. The fish in the carvings include sharks, eels and cods.

Some of the carvings are of deeper anthropological importance, showing Aboriginal weapons, tools and ornaments, and scenes of totemic ritual and hunting out of a way of life long since passed away.

I had a day boat with a small cabin, a single bunk. It was all I could afford after the wreck of my big boat.

I let go and headed out of the bay. Mac was just ahead of me. He waved and I waved back.

I had 40 pots, which is a large number for one man to service. But I wanted to make as much money as I could in as short a time as possible. I often stayed out overnight so I could get in a full day's work.

But Mac always went back to the fishing camp. And I was damned sure now that he was sneaking into my canyon when I wasn't there, and everybody was laughing behind my back. I could understand, now, some of the remarks I'd overheard.

I knew Mac was working the area where I had my pots, and this was very convenient. I always believe in having a decent food at midday, and today I anchored for it. Mac came up alongside and we had a beer together.

I had a poor haul, less than a hundred pounds of crabs on deck. They keep shut for a couple of days out of the water, provided they are kept damp and out of the wind.

"I hope you haven't been into my pots," I said, rather sharper than I intended.

Mac looked at me reproachfully. "How could you?" he said.

"Somebody has been at my pots," I muttered.

"It would be like poaching your friend's wife."

"Yes," I said.

"You want to take to skin diving," he said. "That's the way to catch them. But then you're scared of the water, aren't you?"

I really hated him then. He was the only person I'd told about my fear.

"The sea is your friend," he said earnestly.

"Leave it to Carter to figure out a way to get carried back to camp."

"I prefer to work on deck," I said sourly.

Mac went back into the sea. I knew where every boat fishing was today, most of them, and we were the only two down in the bay. I'd kept the shipshore radio on all morning and there wasn't anybody near us.

I got into my wet suit. I don't really care for skin diving. I'd bought a suit and mask, but the water frightened me. There was waving kelp, barnacles and other scary things. I was always afraid of sharks coming up behind me and snapping off my legs.

I'd never really liked handling crayfish either, with their many legs and their big eyes. But they were worth money, and that overcame my repugnance.

I could use Mac's snorkel close inshore. I went over the side. It was a cold day and the water was grey and cloudy.

He was a better underwater man than I would ever be, but I still hate diving on. He appeared ahead of me and I came up to him and grabbed him from behind. Maybe he thought it was a shark. He turned his eyes were big behind the mask glass. He opened his mouth, lost his snorkel and I was on top of him, holding him down.

He was struggling with a knife at his belt, but I had mine out quicker and I stabbed him. He dropped the knife. There was dark fluid seeping from his wet suit. He looked at it in horror.

Now he was trying to unclip the heavy weights around his waist so he could pop up like a cork. But I had his hands. He was still struggling violently. But he was going to drown.

Once I broke the surface and I gasped a quick breath. But Mac didn't make the surface. I had my knees around his head now, and he was weakening.

And eventually he was quiet.

was no longer alive.

The disappearance of Mac created some concern. I'd gone out to search along with other boats, but nobody found a trace of him or his boat.

I lifted those sea pots two weeks later and I got the best haul I'd ever had. The pots went so full I had difficulty hauling them out.

Other fishermen wanted to know where I'd got such huge crayfish. They hadn't seen them that size in a long time. But I just smiled and kept

THE CAPE YORK KILLER

He stood there defiantly, blood running down his bare chest. Spittle drieked from his mouth. Wild-eyed, he fired the rifle again.

Murray jerked loose from Kern's grip and ran out on deck.

"Give me that rifle, you idiot!" he shouted.

Walcha half turned. "No, boss!" he spat out.

Murray charged at him. The men on the headland stopped firing, surprised. Murray grabbed for the rifle but Walcha pulled it back.

Walcha jerked the heavy wooden butt forward and hit Murray on the side of the head. Murray collapsed unconscious on the deck.

Walcha stood quite still, then toppled and fell across Murray's legs.

"You idiot!" Kern cried. She ran forward and tried to drag Murray back into the shelter of the wheel-house.

But Murray was too heavy. And "Eternalite" was out of control now. Slowly, her bow swung around.

The diesel motor drove her reluctantly towards the headland.

Murray felt his aching head and opened his eyes. The faces above him were blurred. He blinked a few times and tried to focus. He was on his back.

"Are you all right, love?" Kern asked anxiously.

Murray swallowed. "Yeah," he said. He sat up unsteadily. He looked at Bush Hayes, Dooley and the other men in the cabin.

"How's Walcha?" he asked painfully.

"He's dead," Bush Hayes replied. "He died up on deck a few minutes ago. Your boat ran on to the mud flats. That's how we got ahead."

"We're sorry about what happened," Bush Hayes said awkwardly. "We found Bennett's gold watch and money among Walcha's things."

Murray nodded slowly. "I figured it was him when I saw the whisky on board. Walcha couldn't handle the booze. I wouldn't let him drink."

"Did most have caught him stealing the whisky," Kern said sadly.

"Yeah," Murray said. He looked at her. "What are you going to do now?"

Kern's eyes brightened. "I'm going down to Cocktown with you. That's if you'll have me."

Murray squared her arm. He looked up at her and grinned.

"Now I come to think of it, I need a new deck hand," he said.

Menace of the marsupial cats

IF BUSHMEN LIVING alone in the old days didn't have a dog or cat they often found they had other company — a native cat, or a family of these.

These pesky creatures — no relatives to the felines — live by nature among the rocks in hilly country. They prey on birds, rodents and insects and have as many as eight young at a time.

A native cat will come into a human dwelling to live, but seldom gets into or onto shoes, rucksacks though it may be heard mewing about after lights are out at night.

Often they do no harm, but sometimes they break crockery in their nocturnal coverings and gongs.

If a native cat takes a fancy to the farmer's poultry, its presence is advertised by bloodcurdling screams from the hen in the paddock under attack from them like a vampire bat.

Once a settler, rushing out, found three pullets dead and caught the native cat on the act. He struck at the monster with a shovel, chopping the end off its tail.

It then fled, but thinking it might return later, the settler set two rabbit traps in the pullet coop and covered them with straw.

Soon enough the marsupial came again later and was caught in the two traps. Then it was killed — 30 inches from head to tail of spitting fury.

I struggled back to my boat, exhausted, towing him. I had worked out the plan for disposing of his boat. But what about Mac? My original idea had been that he would be discovered drowned. But that was out of the question now. His body would eventually be washed up on a beach, and that knife wound would be discovered.

I hauled Mac up on to the deck of my boat with the winch. I used for lifting crayfish pots. I noticed six new pots I had on deck which I was going to try in a new place. Then I looked at him. Why, it was simple. I had fresh bait.

I unclipped the rubber hose of his boat and sank her in the bay only a hundred yards from the shore. I didn't want to go too far out and be seen by the other boats. She filled surprisingly quickly and went down by the bow with hardly a stirrer.

And Mac, of course, was in the bay too. I worried for some days in case somebody poached those pots. But it didn't happen. The poacher my mouth shut.

Noelken and I cut a lot of crayfish. We never got tired of it, and I took home a real basket from those special pots. Noelken had been off her food for the last weeks.

"I'll make you a crayfish omelet," I said. And I omitted myself. It was light and fluffy and the crayfish cooked with cheese was just right.

"This one has a nice flavor," I said with my first bite.

"Yes," Noelken said and bit into it with enjoyment. It was the first decent meal she'd eaten since Mac's disappearance.

"I wonder what happened to poor Mac?" I said as I finished. "Crayfish omelet was one of his favorites."

And Noelken sighed sadly as she ate.

I looked at her fondly. Life was good. The bowl of fruit never went to the window now. And I had carefully taken off my gumboots at the door so I didn't track in sand. After all, a man has to be a bit understanding.

VENGEANCE IN THE SWAMP

"Did Styles know them?"

"Oh, yeah? Kip, Lefty, I forgot the other two. But he knew them all by name. Anyway, Styles got up and went off with them."

Just then Morrison came back into the doorway and called to him. "Dane, something's come up." They went outside. Morrison's face was tense. "This ain't pretty," he said.

"Stop throwing on it. What happened?"

"He was probably looking for you. He found Karin instead."

"What are you saying?"

"Styles, there were some others with him. I guess they raped the hell out of her. She's at Doc Duncan's place and I guess she's in bad shape."

They got back to Driscoll in half the time it had taken Ferris coming out. They went to Morrison's police jeep with Ferris driving, right to Lee Duncan's cottage. Duncan was the only doctor for a dozen or so towns along that edge of the swamp. As the two men walked in, he said, "Serving lives is supposed to be my business. But I'd skin all those bastards and hang them out in the sun if I could. She's in the back bedroom."

Ferris went in by himself. Morrison made no attempt to go in with him. The girl was lying in bed as still as a stone, with the sheet drawn up to her chin. Her face was badly beaten, her nose and mouth were bruised and her eyes were puffed up as big as fists and turned bluish purple. Her head was swathed in tape and bandages.

"Who was with them, honey?" Ferris asked.

"It was Styles and some others." She made the words sound as though saying each one of them constituted a real effort. "Those crazy bastards— you remember— you brought them in for burning barns—"

"The Cullens?"

"Yes, the Cullens. The two Cullens— and two others— and Styles. I fought them. Dove I really—"

"Get some sleep, honey." Ferris went out to the livingroom where Lee Morrison and Duncan were waiting for him.

"Did she tell you who the others were, Dane?" Morrison said.

Ferris shook his head. "Styles was the only one she could identify."

Within an hour of leaving Duncan's house, the two men were on their way into the swamp. They each carried a rifle, a knife, a hand axe, a length of rope, a light bedroll, and a small sack of provisions. They went on foot with Ferris leading the way. He knew the swamp and just about everyone who lived in it.

They'd been trading along for close to an hour. "I guess," Morrison said, "what it is, is that Styles' mob has hired some swamp people to take care of him, hide him and so forth, until they're able to come and get him. That's the angle we ought to be working on. You know these people in here pretty well. Who do you think the mob would pick?"

Ferris shrugged. "Could be anybody. There's lots of room to hide a man out here and everybody's got some places no one else knows about."

"Yeah, I guess that's the way it would be," Morrison said glumly.

They went on until past sundown. They were on soggy ground most of the time and often actually in water. The air was warm and still even after the sun went down. They kept hearing the rustling sounds of small animals in the growth all about and the never-ending scops and hoots of owls. They went on steadily until Morrison asked, "You know where you're going? You sure we ain't just going around in circles?"

"We're going in the right direction," Ferris said. "There's this woman I want to talk to. She knows a lot about what goes on out here."

Around midnight, Ferris at last came to a stop and pointed through the trees to a small light ahead of him. "That's her place," he said. "She won't talk if she sees a lawman. So you better wait here and I'll come back for you when I'm through."

"Who is she?" Morrison demanded. "What's she worried about a lawman for?"

"But we already have a rubber automobile, life-size statue of you and me playing tennis; a big walk-through plastic tunnel; three flashing neon models; and a self-destructing sculpture we're afraid to play in."

he'd just been involved in the killing of his sister had drawn him back. He rampaged through the swamp "Where are you, you son of a bitch? It ain't going to do you no good to run or hide."

Perry dropped about 10 yards behind him, just far enough to keep him in sight. Then he began closing the gap, moving faster. Cullen moved into an area of thinner growth, the trees spaced further apart. He was still bellowing madly, however, waving both his arms, one hand holding a rifle. Now something that looked like a pond came into view ahead of him. "Yeah, that's mine, Roy," Perry said. He chose a thick, vine-covered broken branch for a weapon and charged in.

When he was 20 feet away, Cullen heard him and swung around, his face gone into a snarl. For a moment it seemed that Cullen would set his rifle around as sure to put a shot into Perry's body. But then the long-striding gator swung inside the rifle, chopping down with the branch at the same time and ripping Cullen's neck halfway down to his shoulder. Cullen dropped at his feet, shaking with pain and shock.

"Jesus! You got me bad, Dave," Cullen whispered hoarsely. "We got to do something fast or I'm going to bleed to death."

"You're not going to bleed to death, Roy," Perry said. "I got something else in mind for you."

He grabbed Cullen by the collar and yanked him down to the ground and then dragged him toward the wet patch that looked like a pond from a distance. But the shimmer of water disappeared as you came up next to it, so that suddenly it wasn't a pond at all but a circular expanse of quicksand. Cullen squawked when Perry grabbed him, but that had been a squawk of pain connected to his spruce wound. Now, however, the squawk took on a different quality entirely, becoming raw fear. "Jesus, Dave, Jesus, Dave, what are you going to do?"

Perry pulled him back up to his feet, heaving him into the ground and then hurled him into the bog. Cullen landed in a sprawling position, hands and rump down. He screamed and trembled his head around. He couldn't free his hands from the muck.

"Dave, Dave, please! Oh, my God, Dave! Not this way. I'm going down... I'm going down!"

Perry crouched at the edge of the quicksand. His eyes were as cold as stones. "You boys have a good time with Karen, Roy?" he asked. "Get yourself a few laughs out of it? Must have been real fun when she fought you. That always makes it better, doesn't it?"

"It was all Styles' doing," Cullen sobbed. "He wanted to get even with you for tracking him down. We just kind of went along."

The quicksand was up to his neck. His head rolled madly above it. Tears streamed down his face. His screams took on a strangled quality as quicksand spilled into his mouth. Moments later the sand reached his forehead, and continued sucking him in until he was entirely out of sight.

As soon as he was gone, Perry stood up and started back toward where the others had been. He rounded the slope and heard the sounds of an argument and as he looked down through the brush, he could make out the second Cullen brother, Andy, covering King Kong Styles with a rifle. Higgins and Paul were standing to the side. Perry had a downhill view of Styles from behind. The New York gambler had the build and probably the strength of a professional wrestler.

"We're paying you plenty to take care of me, you swamp bastard," Styles roared. It was obvious he wanted to rush Andy Cullen, but couldn't with that rifle aimed straight at his chest. "We ain't paying you to bury your sister. We didn't even know you had a sister. What the hell is it to us?"

"This is a family matter, Styles. Down here family matters come first," Cullen said. "You just go ahead with these two boys and I'll catch up with you!"

"We ain't paying you to catch up—"

"Go ahead, Styles! Damn it, go ahead," Cullen shouted. "Can't you tell when a man's got his mind made up?"

They continued to glare at each other, but finally the swamp man's determination registered on Styles and he flung himself away, growling at the other two to come along. "Which way do we go, for chrissakes? What the hell do I know about this jungle?"

Cullen watched them leave. Then he put his rifle down, picked up a shovel and began digging in the soft, wet ground. Sam's body lay close to where he was working. Perry started working down toward him, keeping himself hidden and moving slowly. He wound up about 10 yards up the slope and stayed there until Cullen had finished his grave and was about to climb out of it.

Then Perry rose up out of the brush he'd been hiding in. "That ain't quite deep enough, Andy."

Cullen stood as though turned to stone. When at last he spoke it was in a high-pitched, quivering voice. "What do you mean, Dave?"

Perry said: "You're going to need a deeper grave than that, Andy. Keep digging."

Cullen threw out another shovelful of dirt. His face was wet with sweat. He said, "We didn't mean her no real harm, Dave. If she hadn't done all that fighting..."

"Keep digging, I said. Keep digging."

"Besides, it was Styles' idea. Honest to God, Dave. It was all his idea and he was the one that beat up on her, too. He scared us into doing it with him."

Suddenly Ferris jumped aside. A shovelful of dirt flew towards him. Behind it came Andy Cullen. His face was wild. The shovel was poised over his head.

Ferris fired a single shot into the middle of Cullen's face, smashing him backward onto the pile of dirt at the edge of the grave. He watched a few moments, now the other wasn't moving and went down to look at him.

"Hell, he didn't think I was going to miss at three yards, did he?" Ferris said to himself.

He took Cullen by one foot and dragged to the grave. Then he dumped Skech in on top of her brother. He shoveled the dirt over them, then threw some rocks and growth on top of the grave. He started off in the direction the others had gone.

Ferris went deeper into the swamp, and by mid-afternoon was at an area called The Bottoms Here, the swamp was extreme and a number of the shacks were actually raised up on stilts. The people who lived here were utterly forgotten by time and their governments. They figured in no census. They went to no schools. Scurvy and rickets were endemic to them and some of them were clearly feeble-minded, the products of inbreeding.

They viewed strangers with suspicion and fear, and Ferris encountered nothing but stolen drugs or paying stars whenever he stopped to ask someone about Higgins and Paul. They came from The Bottoms and he was going under the assumption that they'd return there with "King Kong" Stykes.

It was close to sundown when he reached the settlement called Hawkins Corners. It consisted of a store and half a dozen shacks. When Ferris went into the store, he was startled to see Morrison standing at the counter talking to the proprietor, Hawkins. Several other people stood a distance off, watching intently.

Ferris cursed under his breath and thought about stepping back outside before Morrison saw him, but it seemed impractical, particularly as Morrison turned toward him just at that moment.

"What the hell happened to you?" Morrison demanded. "What happened back at that place?"

"She went out the back window and I had to go out after there," Ferris said. "Didn't you hear me holler that I was going after her?"

"I don't know anything about any hollering," Morrison said suspiciously.

"What happened then?"

"I lost her in the swamp, in the dark. How about you?"

"I got a look at Stykes and two others running in the woods," Morrison said, "but I couldn't get close enough to get a shot at them. They were coming in this direction, so I came along behind them, but now I can't get a damn thing out of Hawkins. Either he's an idiot or he's pulling it on."

"He's no idiot," Ferris said. "Hawkins is one of the few of them around here that's got any brains. Here, I'll talk to him."

Ferris approached the counter. Hawkins watched him apprehensively. "We're looking for Paul and Higgins and a big elephant of a man from New York, Ben. You know we wouldn't bother coming way out to this hole if it wasn't for something serious. Now, you don't want to become an accessory. Do you, Ben? You know what an accessory is? An accessory is somebody that gets himself thrown into Vansville for not telling us about something that someone else did. So supposing you tell us about Paul and Higgins and the big New York guy. Did they come through here or didn't they?"

"I was in Vansville once. Maybe eight — twelve years ago. They had a guard used to whump us around with an iron bar. Today it's all lawyers and judges making them take it easy."

"Stop waiting me around, Ben," Ferris said. "You heard what I asked you."

Hawkins darted his eyes to the men watching him. Then he spoke quickly, lowering his voice. "They come through here about an hour ago, Dave."

"They stop for anything?"

"No, they were rushing along."

"Which way were they heading?"

"Heading west."

"They better have been heading west. If not, you're going to be back in Vansville and we'll reactivate that paid with the men her just to make you feel at home."

He rejoined Morrison and the two men went back outside. Ferris said, "Even heading west, there're a couple of different routes they could have taken out of here. Supposing we each take one and..."

"No, we'll stick together," Morrison said.

Ferris shrugged. "Suit yourself."

They left Hawkins Corners moving westward with the men making directly ahead of them slipping down through the trees like an orange balloon. A trail of smoke stretched out ahead and they moved out along it. Ferns led. They went on in silence until the sun went down, and then for another hour past it. Then, with total darkness sinking in, Ferns remarked: "I don't have my axe I must have left it back there at Hawkins' place."

"You'll get it on the way back."

"No, I need it now. I'm going to have to go back for it."

"Are you crazy?" His voice was enraged, disbelieving. "You can't go back for it."

"Yeah, I got to," Ferns said. "I feel naked without it."

He started back through the swamp with Morrison coming and shouting from behind him. "Come back here, you son of a bitch. What do you think you're doing?"

"Just let me take care of this other matter first," Ferns yelled out as he ran back along the trail. He reached Hawkins' Corners and, without stopping to look around, ran right to the store. He wanted satisfaction at what he saw there. "Yeah, I figured this one right. Didn't I?"

A fire was blazing in the pot-bellied stove. Five men sat around it, the same group that had been there earlier. Hawkins was behind the counter, where two men stood. Each of the men held a tin cup. They were Lonnie Peel and Jim Huggins. Ferns faced them, his rifle hanging low. He spoke to Hawkins.

"I thought I told you about being an accessory, Ben. This little trick of yours is going to cost you."

"They come back, Dave. They went through here just like I told you, but . . ."

"Ball, that's just a lot of ball. They were here all the time. It was written all over your face."

Peel spoke up. "You don't want to come on us too hard, Dave. It was Styles and the Cullinane that setpiped up your girl. Me and Jim was just along doing a job."

"We been talking it over, Dave," Huggins said. "Even being on the out of it, we and Lonnie know we done wrong. We're ready to go along with you."

"That'll be a good idea except for you having the accident," Ferns said. "What accident, Dave?" Huggins said, looking puzzled. "We ain't had no accident."

"Not yet, you ain't," Ferns said as he gestured at the men around the stove. "But All of you? Out!"

They got up and scrambled for the door. Ferns said to Hawkins, "You can go or you can stay, Ben. It's all one to me."

Hawkins looked uncertain. Huggins said urgently, "What's this about an accident, Dave? Come on, we'll go along with you. We'll tell you where you can find Styles, too. We ditched him up around that old broken river dam. He was too crazy for us. We got him up there and then we ditched him. Come on, Dave! We'll go along with you."

His voice went high in sudden apprehension. Ferns was moving toward the stove, still keeping them covered. All Hawkins said was, "Oh, my God!" and he came out from behind the counter and walked quickly outside.

"Dave?" Huggins said.

"Stop hugging him," Peel interrupted. "Can't you see he don't want to take us in? He wants to kill us right here."

Ferns looked at the stove. It fell over and blazing coals fell out on the wooden floor. Some coals rolled into a pile of rags which caught fire. The blaze shot up and leapt for the ceiling. The two men at the counter came at Ferns, moving shoulder to shoulder and grabbing for weapons. Their faces were frenzied, their mouths open to shout things he couldn't hear above the roar of the flames.

"Had yourself a real good time with her, didn't you, you bastards? stood around and watched each other . . ."

He swung the rifle around by the barrel, like a bat. The heavy stock smacked first Peel and then Huggins and knocked them to the ground. As they tried to rise, Ferns stood over them and hammered them down. The air was thick with smoke. The fire was everywhere. He beat them into unconsciousness, then turned quickly and ran out the door.

Hawkins stood there crying, his hands to his face. "I had that store my whole life." The building was an inferno, flames leaping up into the sky a hundred feet above it.

"I told you about being an accessory, Ben," Ferns said. He turned and went back the way he'd come, peering through the people of Hawkins' Corners who stood there silently watching the store burn.

It was close to midnight when Ferns heard the rushing sound of the river in the area of the abandoned dam. It had been some 40 years ago that some industrial concern got the idea of harnessing the river to power its machinery. There had probably been a lot of excitement when the project got under way. There was still some rusted machinery there, and the remains of workers' homes and some concrete chunks from the uncompleted dam. These days, no one even knew for sure what company had started the work.

Ferns had moved quickly after leaving Hawkins' Corners. Now at the dam, he began slowing up. He felt strange, peculiar. He'd killed four men outright, and he could claim a share of killing Sarah Cullen. It had affected his nerves, his instincts, his bodily responses. He was acting, hearing and smelling in a way he never had before.

He felt like a harping net, relaxed but purposeful, alert to everything about him in a way no human being could be. So it was that when an unpleasant snarlled his nostrils, he responded to it the way an animal would, knowing instinctively who and what it was—Styles.

He moved straight forward and heard that harsh New York voice. "Really thought you were going to get me back on that chain-pang set-up, didn't you?" Styles said. "A small-time cop like you and you thought you were getting 'King Kong' Styles back on the chain gang. Now, that was stupid of you. That was very stupid!" This was followed by a heavy smashing sound. Then there was a grunt of pain, obviously in Morrison's voice.

Moving closer, Ferra saw a flashlight beam. Suddenly the light pecked up a face. Morrison's face. It was pouring blood. The lawman leaned back against a huge slab of concrete. Styles' fist, big around as a bowling ball, smashed into him again. Morrison's head shot back and once more his grunt of pain reached Ferra.

"The next one's in the gut, baby," Styles said. Now Ferra could see him, a great bulky bear of a man.

"Where gut, Styles?" Ferra called out, slipping behind a tree.

"Was the balls that out there?" Styles roared. His flashlight beamed long beams through the trees.

Ferra laughed and Styles fired off a shot. Then Ferra put his rifle and his hand axe down, drew his knife and started forward, running low to the ground. The bulky gorilla loomed up above him, turning his head this way and that, apparently trying to figure out what was happening. Ferra slashed at him, got him across the belly, and kept going. Styles howled, fired wildly.

Ferra laughed and rushed him again, slipping through the darkness like a shadow.

The giant went down, blood pouring out of him as though out of a broken bag. Ferra moved over him pulling his head up by the hair.

And then Morrison lumbered into him, pushing him weakly "Christ, Dave, enough is enough!" he yelled. "I reckon you killed the others. I don't know how, but I know you did it. But enough is enough. Let's handle at least one of these things within the law."

Ferra, sitting, straggled, dropped his knife. "All right, let's get the son of a bitch up on his feet. I can't say yes or no about the others. But all right, let's bring this one in." EDITOR'S NOTE Boddy cut up though he was, Styles was brought back to Driscoll and returned to the Vanville Prison Farm.

The four mobsters who broke him out of Vanville are also in prison in New York State. They were stopped by police there on their way back from Vanville, and a search of their car disclosed a number of weapons and a quantity of heroin. All four are away on 20-year sentences.

As for Kate Roberts, whose rape triggered Ferra's savage reprisal, she died of internal hemorrhaging before midnight.

TANK BREAKOUT FROM NORMANDY

Once Notre Dame was clear, Nelson set up strongpoints and outposts on all the roads leading into town. At nightfall, on July 27, five Me 109 fighters terrorized the stranded Yanks with a preliminary strafing. Before the Americans could recover, Sayerlein's best unit came charging through the night, splitting the darkness with cannons and tracer fire.

In Notre Dame, Colonel Nelson bounded aboard his command tank and headed out to inspect the road-blocks. A shell smashed his turret to junk, killing him instantly. Tanks and tankettes raced in all directions out of Notre Dame to square off with the oncoming Panzer columns, and the roar of exploding US armor soon degenerated all other din.

Von Kluge's retreating infantrymen had stitched the ground west and south of Notre Dame with every kind of buried lethal obstacle including anti-tank mines, Sels mines, Teller mines, mustard-gas mines, and they had even booby-trapped the hedgerows.

Those tanks that made it through the minefields fought it out gun to gun in slanting ducts, but the Germans had an additional advantage. Larking in wait they had been able to pick targets in advance. The Americans could fire only at flashes in the dark.

By dawn on July 28 browns crossed General Colin's foot, and to First Army Headquarters, Omar Bradley pounded the map table with his fist. The breakthrough threatened to bog down. The bridge across the Seine at Giverny, forming a funnel mouth through which the escaping 84th Corps would have to pour, were still in German hands.

But in the battle zone itself, momentum still gripped the tank crews of the US armored divisions. No man there had time for despair.

The tanks at Villebezon were still fighting for the strategic crossroads. Panzer elements had infiltrated their rear. Sayerlein wasn't taking any chances on merely blunting the American spearheads if possible he'd lop them off.

Briefed of the danger by breathless panthers from his outposts, General Maurice Rose, in command of CCA tanks at Villebezon, pulled at his lines and braced himself for a siege. The Nazi armor closed in.

troops driving due south from Herbolong along the coast had captured Coastwatchers. The German 84th Corps was well and truly caught in the jaws of a gigantic pincer-tracker. But Von Kluge had finally given the signal for withdrawal and behind a huge shield of armor the entire force now moved south for Germany.

Midnight. GI's manning the outposts north of St. Denis in East Texas, sweating in the dark. From the north and west come the ominous clank and rumble of heavy armor...

Sergeant Helen Whittington of Bogalusa, Louisiana, had just taken command of a 41st Armored Infantry platoon in place of an leader, missing in action. The first column of the massive panzer hordes plus 2540 infantry thundered out of the Colatin pocket and overbalanced Whittington's forward element and Sherman and halftracks scattered for safety.

Yelling after them, Whittington leaped to the back deck of our tank and grunted at back into action, his hoarse firing instructions echoing down through the hatch. The Sherman's 75 roared, hurled shells into the leading Mark VI and found a vulnerable spot that turned the Tiger into a smoking roadblock which triggered a missile traffic jam.

"Come on!" yelled Whittington. The Shermans rolled, bulldozed left and right through the hedgerows and trundled off along both flanks of the three-mile column of tanks and assorted mobile armor. Gunmen looked the firing panel until their feet ached. Vehicle after vehicle in the stalled column was plastered with 75s and machine gun slugs.

Whooping infantrymen rode or scuttled alongside the tanks, and German crew members abandoning their burning vehicles floundered into bananae, fire, grenade bursts or flying bayonets. Many of the Germans hauled out their own automatic pistols and knives. The glare of fires and gun flashes cast unholy illumination on bloody hand-to-hand fighting around and between the dueling tanks.

By daybreak all highways between St. Denis in East and the Channel coast were choked with wrecked or disabled Tigers, Panthers, Jagdpanthers, halftracks, personnel carriers, self-propelled artillery, and piled-up tanks of dead General Tychers, commander of the 2nd Panzer Grenadier Division, took a US shell in the chest and died on the threshold of his command post. Para-stroke infantry and tank crews stumbling west from the vast smoking graveyard of the 84th Corps, were cornered by a detachment of 105 mm howitzers and the American panzers slaughtered them in droves.

By nightfall on July 30, General Omar Bradley could chalk up Operation Cobra as a success. The 84th Corps was decimated, its escape routes finally sealed. Von Kluge's one great effort to smash the A3 was with his armor had failed.

The war had 10 more months to age. But the doom of Hitler's Reich was certified the day General Colmar's tank crews smashed through the German lines below St. Lo. If Hitler couldn't see it, Field Marshal Guntler Von Kluge could. A couple of weeks after the Allied breakthrough he reached for his army pistol and shot himself in the head.

DARLING, WHAT BIG EARS YOU'LL HAVE . . .

A woman's age can be judged fairly accurately by studying her ears. The systematic examination of more than 40,000 female ears in the US and Canada has proved that the ear continues to grow until death.

After the age of 25 all ears assume an increasing borsariam of contour. A beautiful and seductive woman whose first youth has departed may not show the fact in other ways, but her tell-tale ears will surely reveal the story of the flight of time.

Then there is the little wrinkle that comes just in front of each feminine ear during the thirties — a certain and irremediable sign.

Near the top of each ear, just within the downturned edge and slightly towards the back, will be found, if one feels for it, a slight bump of cartilage. This is a remnant of what was originally the tip of the ear when, many centuries ago, the organ in our remote ancestors had a point on it. Most of the ages today have pointed ears, but in human beings the upper edge of the organ has, in time, become folded over so that it covers the real tip.

Further proof that ears aren't a girl's best friend is the fact that they play a part in making figure-conscious females hungry. Inside the ear there is a nerve which stimulates the stomach. A few centuries ago scribes of the City of London discovered the trick of rubbing the skin behind their ears before going to a croc banquet.

The ear the hunger nerve in action and made them conscious enough to march away through crowds after course of a marathon feast. Since then, the nerve has been called "The scribe's nerve", but all females have it too.

On the average the hearing of women is more acute than that of men. A husband who stays out late and thinks of typosing upstairs in the fond belief that his bed partner won't hear him shouldn't chance it. The odds are, distinctly, that the little women will be turned up to every cry sound he makes, even though she may be sound asleep at first.

Not only do women hear better than men, but their hearing deteriorates less as they get older. However, when a woman's hearing does start to fail — and everybody's does with age — the deterioration is twice as rapid as a man's.

The size and shape of human ears are hereditary. Each type of ear, so to speak, is headed down with comparatively little change from one generation to the next. If a chick has hairy ears, however — that is with black hair growing from their outer edges — the odds are that some members of her family tree (perhaps centuries back) came from the Mediterranean Sea region.

More women than ever are having their ears pierced these days because of a boom in the fashion for dangly earrings. If a woman wanted to adorn her ears in the Stone Age, her husband or boy friend crudely pierced her lobes and plugged them with pieces of dinosaur bone. This was supposed to stop evil spirits from entering her body.

Bronze Age chicks pierced their ears in a more skilful manner, using a nail, a hammer, and a piece of wood behind the lobe. Metal objects shaped like baskets were then hung from them, much to the frustration of lovers who knew that ear lobes are sensitive zones and wanted to nibble on them.

During the time of the Roman Occupation, the warlike Britons and Anglo-Saxon warriors had pierced ear lobes, and habitually wore ear-rings even in battle. But after the 10th century they declined in popularity.

For 500 years decorating the ears was considered silly stuff, until a new interest in fine clothes and jewellery arose during the Renaissance. Queen Elizabeth I and Sir Walter Raleigh both wore double pearl-shaped pearly attached to their ear lobes. Pearl ear-rings stayed popular with men and women until the reign of Charles I.

Most men stopped wearing ear-rings in the 18th century, but today some men have at least one lobe pierced for a single tuning. Many commercial fishermen still believe that piercing one ear and putting in a "stopper" or gold earring, improves their eyesight. And in the days of sailing ships nearly all seamen wore huge ear-rings because they believed that if a man fell overboard his particular patron saint would hook a line in one of the rings and pull him to safety.

Pierced ears also have a distinct sexual connotation. They used to be the trademark of African vagrants looking for husbands, and of French whores looking for clients. Today they're all the rage again.

But stranger things than alien to age and sexuality are found in female ears. One 17-year-old girl complained of severe pain in her head recently. Inside her ear — and sprouting festly — was a beetle.

THE OYSTER PIRATES

Barton was feeding the chief whisky. Every night they would hold a party in the chief's hut.

The hold was almost full now. I figured we had about $10,000 worth of oysters. Not a bad haul for a few weeks' work. I was happy about the deal. My share would put me well in front.

Then the refrigeration unit broke down. I watched with despair as Barton struggled to repair it. The thermometer kept rising and I thought of all those oysters in the hold. A few more degrees and they would start to rot.

Smiley was sympathetic. "Never mind, boss. That's the way it goes sometimes."

"Yeah," I growled. "All we'll have is a cargo of rotten oysters. It'll make a nice old stink, on top of everything else."

Barton worked grimly, his pale face streaked with sweat and grease. At last he got the motor going again and the temperature in the hold started to drop. I breathed a sigh of relief.

"It won't last," he grunted. "I've done a makeshift job. I'll have to get those bloody boogies really working now."

I grunted. "Let's pull out right now," I said. "We've got enough oysters."

"The hell we have!" Barton scoffed. "I want a full hold."

Barton was drinking heavily. I noticed his frequent trips into the panga and I guessed he had a bottle of whisky hidden in some cool spot. I treated him about it.

"You want to lay off the booze,"

I said. "You're treating these natives too rough."

He glared at me.

"Go to hell, Doyle!" he snarled. "I'll do what I like! It's all my money involved here. You only supply the boat."

"It's your old man's money you're playing with," I bit out.

"Don't you worry about whose money it is. Just remember you get a 50 percent of the profits."

"You're an impossible bastard, Barton."

I went back on board Hamstride and checked the temperature in the hold. It was okay. The oysters were still frozen, but now I knew that the refrigeration unit was likely to break down at any time. I didn't feel so happy about that.

Suddenly there was a sounding up on deck. Shots of anger, the kind of a falling body.

I raced up on deck, and stopped short with surprise and shock.

Barton stood there with a bottle of whisky in his hand. Smiley lay on his back, his dark eyes glazed.

"I caught the black bastard throwing my whisky!" Barton growled out. "Look!"

He waved the bottle at me. It was three-quarters full. The top was off and whisky had run down Barton's arm. The fumes were overpowering.

I ran across to Smiley. He was unconscious. I got some water from the galley and threw it in his face. He didn't respond.

I looked at Barton. "He's got concussion," I said harshly. "You hit him with that bottle too hard."

"He punched my whisky!" Barton shouted.

"To hell with your bloody whisky!" I shouted back. "What about Smiley here? He's got to have medical attention?"

"We can't leave yet!"

"We're going to leave!"

I stood face to face with Barton, determined. I knew this was the showdown. It had to come sooner or later. I had learned to hate the bastard now.

Barton kicked the bottle and I moved, ready for action. Suddenly, Smiley groaned.

Barton looked down at him and lowered the bottle. I dropped on to one knee and shook Smiley gently. Light flickered into his eyes.

"How are you, mate?" I asked.

"All right," Smiley groaned. "All right."

"How's your head?"

"Jesus! My bloody head! It's on fire!"

"Barton hit you with a bottle,"

Smiley groaned again and looked up at Barton. "You're a mean bastard, aren't you? I had only two swallows out of your lousy bottle."

Barton scowled. I helped Smiley down to his bunk. Barton followed, his lips curling.

"Do you need a doctor, mate?" I asked Smiley.

"No," Smiley replied. He grinned painfully. "All the medicine I need is in the bottle."

I looked at Barton wearily. He backed a step, his pale features tight, clutching the bottle. Then he decided to play it cool.

"What's one bottle of whiskey?" he growled. "Here you are. Give it to him."

I took the bottle and handed it to Smiley. "Stay in your bunk for a couple of days, mate, and you'll be all right."

"Yeah," Smiley said.

Another morning passed and I was still worried about the refrigerated hold. The motor had broken down again, but Barton managed to get it back into action.

I made up my mind. We had to leave this island now. I rowed the dinghy towards the shore. I would find Barton and have it out with him.

A native ran up to me as I tied the dinghy to a mangrove.

"Mash! Mash!" he cried, pointed towards the jungle.

"What is it?" I asked.

The native could not speak pidgin. He waved frantically, eyes rolling.

There was something very wrong. I had found out that it takes a lot to upset these easy-going people. I picked up my rifle from the dinghy and walked towards the jungle.

It was cool under the banana leaves. Ferns draped the trees and there was a musky smell from the rotting vegetation underneath. I pushed forward along a little-used track, rifle at the ready.

Two hundred yards inland I came to a small clearing alongside a narrow river. Water gurgled and glistened in the sunlight. I saw Barton then.

He was standing by the river bank loading one of the young native women. I recognized her. She was the prettiest of all, and her name was Trish. She wore nothing but a grass skirt and her firm young breasts peeped seductively.

She struggled against Barton's probing hand, but Barton was too strong. He tried to force her down on to the grassy bank.

Suddenly there was movement in the jungle to my left. The head man's son, the young native Barton had threatened earlier, walked out into the open carrying a three-pronged fishing spear. His face twisted with hatred as he saw Barton holding the girl. His arm drew back ready to throw the spear.

I shouted a warning, raised my rifle.

Barton spun around. He let go the girl and grabbed for his pistol. The girl screamed, clung to him frantically, her black skin glistening with sweat.

Barton backhanded her across the mouth. She fell back screaming into the water. Barton pulled out his pistol and aimed it at me.

Then I saw something which sent a shudder through me. A long, black object rose from the river depths and moved swiftly towards the floundering girl. The crocodile opened its grey jaws, showing rows of jagged teeth.

Barton had not seen the native boy yet. He concentrated on me. I had to make a quick decision then: stop Barton, stop the native, or stop the crocodile.

I jumped sideways. Barton's bullet ripped past my head. I made my decision. I fired at the roaring crocodile.

The three-pronged spear struck Barton full in the chest. He staggered back, mouth gaping, a choked scream on his lips.

The crocodile kept high as my rifle bullet tipped into the front of its skull. I fired again and again. It twisted and writhed, its long tail thrashing the water.

I ran forward to help Trish, but she had scrambled up the river bank. Her black eyes were wide with fear. She stood there, shaking all over. The boy walked forward, took her arm and comforted her.

I looked at Marion. The spear stuck out of his chest at a grotesque angle. His face was pale as death. The head man's arm walked over to me and stared down at the dead man, his face expressionless.

"Mine as good," he said.

He pulled the spear from the corpse and led Tiko back into the jungle.

We buried Barton on Torki Island and Esmeralda headed back across the Coral Sea towards Townsville. The refrigeration motor kept breaking down, but each time somehow I got it going again.

We eventually made it The Department of Fisheries got suspicious and asked me a lot of awkward questions, but the big oysters were a sensation on the Sydney market.

The police accepted my story that Barton had been spared by an unknown native. The case was referred back to Bougainville, but nothing came of it.

I never returned to Torki Island.

He left her there and took a taxi across town to Browder's office on King Street East. It was only a 10-minute ride, but he reached the building with a growing sense of apprehension. Marjorie Fleming wasn't at her desk in the outer office, and Rand crossed quickly to Browder's door. The literary agent was at his desk, head bent over Major Sabco's manuscript. A closed volume of moments by a Scotland Yard inspector lay at his elbow.

"Hello, Rand. I've just been reading over the book. It's quite interesting."

"So I gathered. I wonder if I could read it myself."

Browder hesitated and closed the folder containing the manuscript. "That wouldn't be quite ethical at this stage of things. His publisher hasn't seen it yet."

"A woman told me this morning that your life might be in danger because of it."

The little agent chuckled. "Who'd tell you a thing like that?"

"Her name is Mrs. Montain. She teaches at the University."

Browder nodded. "I've heard of her. She's something of a dam mother to the happen and American drift dodgers. The police questioned her once about helping them smuggle narcotics across the border."

He frowned and opened the manuscript once more, flipping over the pages until he found what he sought. "I thought not. Sabco speaks of a woman named Mrs. Rand. He met her soon after he came to Toronto. There's no last name, but she taught at the University with him. She was his mistress for several years."

Rand stared out the window at the city. "I don't think she'll be happy about that chapter."

On his way out Rand saw that Marjorie Fleming was back at her desk. She was writing something on a piece of newspaper, and he caught a glimpse of it before she hurriedly

"That would be Terry Sandow. He's an American."

"His girl friend, Marjorie, says you know something about Major Gregory Sabco."

"Well, Major Sabco taught at the University for a good many years. We were class friends, and he told me about some of his experiences."

"Inough that you think his life may be in danger?"

"He told me that once, years ago. He said there were things in his past life that could cost him his life."

"Did Sabco ever marry here?"

"No," she answered, and looked away.

"He had no family in England, either. No one close. It's strange."

"Some men are like that."

"What did he teach here?"

"Languages — English, French, German. He was very good."

Rand stared at the sky. "The memoirs are finished — he delivered the manuscript to his agent last night. Do you fear for both their lives?"

She suddenly turned on him. "Just why did the British send you here, Mr. Rand?"

He couldn't answer that, and he didn't bother to try. "We'll talk again. Thank you, Miss Montain."

MISS UNIVERSE

"This is really a Miss Universe contest."

"Helen, the car keys?"

cornered it. N.B. August Bear, the note read. He wondered if N.B. stood for Norman Browder, and what his connection was with August Bear.

"Anything I can do for you, Mr. Rand?"

"No. I just wanted to tell you that I saw Iris Montain this morning. I'd like to see her again, and you too."

Marjorie Fleming hesitated, glancing again at the note she was covering with her hand. She seemed anxious to have him leave. "There's a meeting tonight of American students living in Toronto. Iris Montain is going to speak at it. Meet me at the corner of Yonge and Bloor at eight o'clock and I'll take you along."

"It's a date," he told her.

She was smiling as he left, but it was a forced smile. She hadn't wanted him to see that note, and that was enough to make him curious about N.B. August Bear.

Marjorie was waiting for him at the corner of Yonge and Bloor that evening, and she led him a block away to a big old movie theatre that had recently been remodelled and split into two smaller ones. They went through the outer lobby and then through a door past the ticket taker.

"It's quite clean, really," she told him. "They cut up these big old theatres and nobody ever knows how much space is left over. We have a meeting room here that most of Toronto doesn't even know exists."

"Including the police?" he asked. They'd entered a low-ceilinged room where rows of folding chairs were set up in front of a small speaker's platform. The room was crowded and smoky.

"These meetings aren't illegal," she replied.

"But smoking marijuana is?" The odor of it was unmistakable.

She waved the smoke away and found there were seats. "Sometimes it's like that, with half the audience turned on," she said. It didn't seem to bother her.

After a moment Iris Montain appeared, dressed in a neatly tailored summer suit. She stopped to chat with a few of the young people and finally made her way to the low platform at the front of the room. Rand had to admit that her talk was good. She spoke informally of peace and love and freedom, reaching her audience with every sentence. When it was over they applauded warmly, and clustered around her at sandwiches and pitchers of beer were brought out for refreshments.

"They're hungry," Rand commented to Marjorie.

"Smoking pot gives them an appetite." She waved to an approaching young man and motioned him over. "This is Terry, Mr. Rand."

He was a clean-cut youth with surprisingly short hair. Rand shook his hand and said, "From what I'd heard I was expecting more hair."

Terry grinned boyishly. "It's for crossing the border. The customs guys get uptight at long hair and start searching for pot right away."

"Do they find any?"

"Not on me. I'm clean."

"Then why bother to cut your hair short?" Rand asked logically.

The boyish eyes hardened with suspicion. "You a cop?"

"No."

"He's all right," Iris Montain said, coming up to join them. "He's just British."

Terry relaxed a bit, and after a moment Marjorie herded him away to the refreshments. "He's the one who's uptight," Rand observed.

Iris agreed. "You made him nervous. He's been running pot across the border for months, maybe some of the hard stuff too. I understand he has a big shipment to go over next month and doesn't know how to get it across. The customs men are wise to most of the tricks by now."

"You encourage these criminals?"

"Of course not, Mr. Rand! And happily most American youths here don't engage in them. But if I want to keep their friendship, to talk to them the way I did this evening, I can hardly report them."

Rand glanced around, making sure no one could overhear them. "I was talking with Browder about the book. You didn't tell me you'd been Sabar's mistress."

Her face went white. "Who and I was?"

"Sabar wrote about it."

"That ruins!"

"You should have told me. It explains your interest in Subac and his past."

"We were both so much younger then."

"Everyone was younger then."

"He used to sing to me - German songs that he'd learned from war prisoners. You know he was a front-line intelligence officer before he was wounded."

Rand nodded. "I know. Tell me something. You know Subac well for a good many years. Do you think he really has fears about his past life? Do you think those fears would be great enough for him to leave some parts out of his book?"

"If he wrote about me, I think he'd write about anything."

"That's what I think too," Rand told her. "I believe I'll talk to Browder again and try to get a look at that manuscript."

"Are you the one to fear, Rand? The man from his past?"

"No, I'm not from anybody's past."

He left the meeting hall and headed back to his hotel. Browder's home phone was listed in the local telephone directory, and Rand tried that number first. No one answered the ring, and he called the office next. Browder answered on the second ring.

"This is Rand. About Subac's manuscript."

"Yes?" Browder's voice was tight with something like fear.

"I must have a look at it."

"Rand, there's something in the manuscript that could be very dangerous. It's—" There was a pause.

"What? Browder, what is it?"

Browder's voice had broken off in mid-sentence. There was a noise, and then a scream. "My God!" the agent shouted into the phone. "Hold her!"

Then there was a loud crack that could only have been a gunshot. In another second the connection was broken. Rand grabbed the flat 300 automobile from his suitcase and headed for the door.

When Rand reached the office the inner door was standing open. Browder was crumpled behind his desk, shot once through the forehead. The manuscript was gone. Rand searched quickly, but it was nowhere to be found. He sighed and left the office exactly as it was, careful not to touch anything with his bare fingers.

He went downstairs to a pay phone and tried to call his old Margerie at their home. Neither answered, it was nearly an hour since he'd left them at the meeting. Either one could have got there in time to kill Browder.

He called Major Subac's apartment next. The phone rang for several moments before a tired voice answered. "Major, this is Rand. Somebody killed Browder tonight and stole your manuscript. Do you have a carbon copy?"

"What? Yes, of course. But who would kill him? Why?"

"Someone who doesn't want your book published. Someone who might come after the carbon copy. Look, I'll be right over. Don't let anyone in till I get there - not even an old girl friend."

"Rand?"

"Yes."

"How do I know you didn't kill Browder and take the manuscript?"

"That's a chance you'll have to take, Major." Rand hung up.

It was after 11 by the time he reached Subac's hide-front apartment. The white-haired man answered on the first ring, obviously frightened. "I can't believe it about Browder," he said.

"Whom did you mention in your book, Major? Any women besides him? Anyone who would kill to prevent its publication?"

"I mentioned women, of course. But I can't believe any of them would kill over it."

"Then it must be the Chamberlain affair. It goes down to that."

The old eyes were watching him.

"I told you it's barely mentioned."

"Under the circumstances I can't believe you, Major. Browder found something in that manuscript of yours that greatly upset him. And possibly caused his death."

"But who—?"

"I was talking to Browder when he was shot. His last words were

"Hold her." That not only implies that his killer was a woman, but also that a third person was with them in the office."

"You think it was Mrs. Montain?"

"She seemed upset that you'd write about your relationship. But there's another possibility. His secretary, Marygrove Fleming, was violent on making me believe Browder's life was in danger. That might have been a cover for her own plans. She was writing an odd note this noon that puzzled me. It said simply N.B. August Bear. Mean anything to you?"

Major Subac thought about it. "N.B. is Norman Browder?"

"I assume so."

"You think it's a code of some sort?"

Rand shrugged. "Doubtful, but she did want to hide it. Anyway, let's take a look at your copy of the manuscript."

"Certainly." Major Subac was just starting toward the bedroom when they heard a noise. "Someone's in there," he whispered to Rand.

Tagging his automatic from beneath his jacket, Rand sprinted for the bedroom. He was just in time to see a figure stumble through the glass doors that led to a ground-floor patio. "Stop!" he called out, then ran after the shadowy intruder. He could see it was a man now, carrying what looked like the copy of Subac's manuscript.

"Hold it!" Rand shouted. "I have a gun!"

The figure hesitated, started to turn, and Rand was on top of him. "I'm not armed!" the other gasped. "Don't shoot!" It was the voice of Marygrove's American friend, Terry Sandow.

Rand took the manuscript and ran his hands over the youth. He was unarmed. "You're in deep trouble," he said.

"Give me a break, Rand!" He tried to pull away, but Rand's grip was firm.

"Inside, come on!" Rand ordered.

Major Subac stood at the open glass doors, a Lager in his hand. "Who is it?" he asked.

"His name's Terry. His girl friend was Browder's secretary." Subac lowered the gun but kept it in his hand, and Rand asked, "How about it, Terry? Ready to talk?"

The youth stared at the floor. "I don't know anything," he mumbled.

"He came for the carbon copy of the manuscript," Subac decided. "He and the girl must have killed Browder."

"I didn't kill anyone!" Terry mused. "We just heard about Browder on the radio?"

"Then who sent you for the manuscript?"

He bit his lower lip. "Mrs Montane. She wanted it."

"I see."

"When she heard Browder was dead she was afraid someone would go after the carbon copy. She wanted to get it first. She asked me to steal it from Major Sobie because he wrote things in it about the two of them."

"I'll buy that explanation for the moment," Rand said.

"You believe him?" Sobie asked incredulously.

"I believe him," Rand turned on the youth. "But what about N.S. August Borg?"

"What?"

"It was a note that Margorie wrote. What does it mean?"

The young man flushed. "N.S. is New Brunswick. You can hunt him in New Brunswick in the summer, and I'm going up there with some other guys in August. I asked her to check the hunting regulations for me."

"So you've taken up hunting?"

"Yes, I guess so," Terry mumbled.

"With a short barrel?"

"I—[ ]"

"And the customs people won't even look twice when you cross the border with a dead bear on the car. If I remember my geography, New Brunswick borders on Maine, a perfect place to cross over with a dead bear stuffed with marijuana."

"How did you—?"

Rand smiled. "Just putting things together. Margorie had to have some reason for hiding that note, and it's told me you had a shipment to go across the border. My only mistake was in thinking the N.S. linked it with Norman Browder."

"Then that should prove I didn't kill him. I hardly know the man?"

"We'll see," Rand said. He picked up the manuscript and began leafing through it, looking for the passage about Chamber. The manuscript was neatly typed, with the characters black and sharp against the page. Something flashed in Rand's mind, and then all at once it hit him. He knew the whole thing.

"This isn't a carbon copy," he said quietly. "It's the original manuscript."

The Lager in Major Sobie's hand turned and pointed at him. "You, Mr Rand, that's correct. It's the original, and that means I killed Norman Browder to get it back."

Rand nodded. "It means something else, too. It means that the real Major Sobie has been dead for 25 years, and that you are General Hans Holder, late of the German army."

The white-haired man barely moved a muscle. "You suddenly know a great deal," he said.

"Once I saw this was the original manuscript, the rest of it just fell into place. Even allowing for 25 years, you look nothing like the picture of Major Sobie in my office."

"Even your eyes are different. You came here and taught German at the University. That in itself proves nothing, but you also used to sing German songs to his — songs you claimed to have learned from War prisoners."

"But the real Major Sobie served only in Burma and London. He would have had no front-line contact with German prisoners, and no opportunity to learn their songs and their language so well."

"There was also the little quiz you gave me yesterday. The questions were all German-oriented, the sort of facts a high-ranking German officer would have known. And Browder's dying word was Holder, not Holdier. He died with your name on his lips, General."

The Lager moved between Rand and Terry. "Holder died in that place, ought. He was shot down by the British."

"I believe he survived, General."

The real Major Sobie heard rumors of a survivor and went to investigate, thinking it might be Chamber. But the Frenchman was dead. You were the survivor, General. The war had just ended, and people like you were being arrested for the war crimes trials. You needed a way out of Germany.

"I think you killed Sobie and took his identity. It was dangerous, but it was your only way out. Of course you couldn't return to London where Sobie was known, so you resigned his intelligence job and moved to Canada to start a new life."

"If that were true, why would I attempt to write Sobie's memoirs?"

"That was your fatal mistake, of course. But when the American publisher approached you with the deal, it seemed just too good to turn down. You had retired from teaching and you needed the money. Besides, after 25 years you had almost become Sobie anyway."

"You know the publisher was mainly interested in the Chamber incident, and I imagine you fitted out the rest of the book with transplanted memories of your own youth, plus the true story of your life in Canada. But you had to write something about the London years — the part you know least well. I think this is where you tripped up.

"What time do you have?"

"When I visited Browder at his office he had a volume of Scotland Yard memoirs on the desk next to your manuscript. I think you lifted verbatim incidents from other books of memoirs, and from books on cryptography.

"Unfortunately, Browder recognized some as phlegmons - he was probably checking one of them with the Scotland Yard book. That was what he meant by the manuscript being dangerous. It was dangerous to you, General, because it suggested you weren't Subic.

"And once he knew that, he followed the same reasoning I did to deduce you were really Holder. When he scouted you of this, you had to tell him and take back the manuscript. All this time, it wasn't Major Subic who feared the past. It was General Holder."

The white-haired man nodded slowly. "You are too smart for your own good, Mr. Rand. But 25 years is too long a time to go down the drain now. It may be too late to try another war crimes, but there's still the murder of Major Subic. And I have a life here I don't want to lose." He shifted the gun slightly. "I think it can be made to appear that you two killed each other."

He was just raising the gun when Tony leaped. Holder turned and fired, and then Rand's own gun was out again, and he squeezed the trigger. Holder gasped and went down hard, fanning the wall with his blood.

"Are you hit?" Rand asked the youth.

"Just grazed me. But I think you killed him."

Rand put away the gun and walked to the telephone. He knew the outcome would be planning to London, but somehow it wasn't pleasing to him. He'd ended up being the man whom Holder-Subic had feared after all - the assassin from across the sea.

THE TIME OF THE CATFISH

The death toll was 60,000, with hundreds of thousands of others maimed, burned, and driven out of their minds by the endless convulsions of the tortured earth.

The greatest single tragedy occurred at a Tokyo Army clothing depot, where, in an open space of something like 14 acres, more than 30,000 people were quite literally roasted to death by huge firestorms that came sweeping over them from the burning city.

Now, on the exact spot of this holocaust, a shrine and a museum have been erected called the Earthquake Memorial Hall. The ground plan of the building is that of a Christian cross, the cross crowned by a Buddhist pagoda, with Shinto motifs all around the pagoda. The building is intended to symbolize the fact that people of all races and creeds suffered in this appalling disaster.

Inside the building, row upon row of earthenware cracks and wooden beams preserve the names of 20,000 victims. A 20-volume record lists the names of all who perished in Tokyo.

During the Great Kanto Earthquake, shocking, almost unbelievable details filtered out of the country and into the world press, being relayed to the tune of millions of pounds and dollars.

Full publicity was the policy then, as it is now, but the Japanese War Cabinet deemed it unwise to publicize the earthquake and tidal waves that struck the Nagoya Prefecture in 1944, when the country was at war. Only want and often misleading news ever found its way through to the outside world.

Japan struck again at 4.30 in the morning in December 1944, this time at Osaka. Reports arrived at that city painted a picture almost equal to the Great Kanto Earthquake.

Kushimoto and Shima, with populations of better than 30,000, had been wiped out, mostly by fire. Kannan had been completely inundated with west-high mud, and a 10-foot tidal wave had left a fearsome path of destruction and death. A freight train had disappeared altogether and was never seen again. Thousands of fishing vessels had been swept out to sea, and tens of thousands of refugees flooded the roads.

In the Wakayama Prefecture, even the hills were not enough to stop the tidal waves, which struck five times in succession. Shoshomura, a small village of some 60 houses on the other side of the hills from Tanabe, was simply one huge stretch of water.

Eyewitnesses to the disaster in Tanabe swore that they had seen a strange light far out at sea a few minutes before the earthquake and the tidal waves. Close to 200,000 people lost their homes in the area.

The outskirts of Kuman looked as though some huge monster from out of mythology and nightmares had been playing fiendish pranks upon the land. Rocks and fragments of walls were found in the middle of paddy fields miles from their original foundations, buried there by the tidal waves. A coastal vessel weighing over 100 tons was lifted on top of a house.

But if the 1946 earthquake was the most widespread experienced in modern times, the next, in 1948, was a more concentrated and terrible one. It struck Fukui at 3:14 pm on June 30, 1948.

Eyewitnesses fortunate enough to be on the nearby hills have described how the entire city of both solid buildings and flimsy bamboo dwellings seemed to rise up into the air, spin around several times, and then collapse in a gigantic heap of flames and smoke.

Although the shocks lasted for only a few seconds, they split down for the city's 50,000 inhabitants. In Fukui's Toko Theatre alone nearly 1000 patrons died when the building collapsed.

One of the heroes of the tragedy was Taro Sato, a primary school teacher. Trapped by one arm under a blazing building, he calmly bucked off his own arm with an axe and successfully escaped.

Stories were told of the ground splitting open to form bottomless crevices up to 30 feet deep, into which people were seen to fall. Then the shuddering earth closed itself over them.

The full extent of the Nagoya earthquake of 1944 will probably never be known, thanks to the curtain of secrecy imposed during those war years. But according to Europeans living in Japan at the time, it did more damage to Japan's war industries, concentrated in that area, than all the Allied bombings — including the atom-bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

With this sort of record, this sort of pattern slowly but relentlessly building, for just how long will Nippon continue to exist? How long before the islands crack and sink beneath the sea, as did Atlantis? Japanese scientists are working hard on solving the problem.

THE BLIND MAN AND THE BLACKMAILER

"So let us assume that the murderer called by appointment. What business would a man usually have with a blackmailer — particularly a man, or men, in the positions of the two Americans?"

"They'd be anxious to pay up and take possession of the negatives and prints," the inspector said.

"Precisely. I believe Figgot went to the boarding house to pay the money Tyler was demanding for the pictures. Probably he entered the boarding house unnoticed by any of the other residents — Donald said there were all sorts of people staying in and out. He found Tyler's room and offered to pay the blackmail money. Tyler would have already taken out the photographs Figgot was interested in, re-locked and fiddled the strong-box and put the key away again.

"But something went wrong with the transaction. Perhaps at the last moment Tyler decided to raise the price, or perhaps he was going to hold on to the negatives. You'll have to find out from Figgot. Anyway, there was a fight that ended in Tyler's death, and Figgot took the negatives and prints of himself and his friend from Tyler's body. Now, according to the police doctor, death occurred about eight o'clock, half an hour before Mr James visited Tyler's room, and I have no doubt the doctor is correct. Figgot wanted, because he knew he had to leave the boarding house without being seen.

"Then, about 8.30, just as he was about to leave the room, you, Mr James, came in the front door. He stopped back inside Tyler's room to wait until you had gone past. But unfortunately for him you knocked on the door, which fell slightly open, and asked to come in. Figgot saw that if you came in you would trip over Tyler's body."

"Then Figgot had an inspiration. He picked up the body and propped it up in the armchair in a natural sitting position. You were guided by Figgot's wife, which you took to be the voice of the new boarder, and you walked towards the chair. But because Figgot was standing behind the chair you walked too far and bumped into Tyler's knees and feet.

"Then you asked if you might feel Tyler's face. That must have been a nasty moment for Figgot, but he reached out, took your hand and guided it straight to Tyler's face. He even gave the head a slight turn so that you wouldn't question whether or not Tyler was alive."

"But why did Figgot and his friend have to kill the girl?" Donald asked.

"They had to kill her before she learned that Tyler had been murdered. Figgot knew that once the police had taken possession of the photos they would track her down to get the addresses of the three men. Figgot and his friend feared she'd realize that two of the negatives and sets of prints were missing from the strong box, and would conclude that one of the men in the missing photos was probably responsible for Tyler's death. Of course she'd tell this to the police, so Figgot and his friend had to kill her first."

"There was an awful lot of ginewick in all of that, Mr Hodgkins," said Inspector O'Hare.

"That's true, Inspector," Hodgkins admitted. "I never pretended it was anything else. The crucial test, of course, was whether or not Mr James, when he heard Figgot's voice, assumed it was Tyler speaking."

"I was quite sure it was Tyler," said James. "I could scarcely believe my own."

Donald added: "And Figgot's reaction when he saw Mr James was a dead giveaway. He went as white as a sheet."

James came in from the kitchen carrying a tray laden with cups of tea, and Inspector O'Hare cleared a space in front of him on the table. "I wasn't absolutely positive we were on the right track, either, until I saw Figgot's face," he admitted.

"I never find it necessary to be absolutely positive about anything," said Hodgkins pedantically. O'Hare replied, obvious. "It's different in police work, Mr Hodgkins. We can't afford to go off half-cocked."

Hodgkins sighed. "Yes. I'd noticed."

"I'm not sure, Inspector," said James, "but I think you just raised a lesson on grammar."

VENGEANCE VIGIL

"How would a goat get to Bulpine Meadows?" Mal inquired.

"Full of lead," snapped old Moss. "But if you're plumb set on it, you can go back to them two cotton-woods with the boulder between and go up over the ridge. That will fetch you down into a shallow draw where there's a trail leadin' off to the southwest."

"The trail Mary Randall was ridin'?" shot through Mal's mind.

"That trail," went on the oldster, "will fetch you 15 mile up through the hills smack into Bulpine Meadows. But you won't know it — you'll be cold meat."

Mal placed his hat off the floor and slid wearily to his feet. "I'll take an a ponder up thatway," he said.

"You'll find your cowhand in the barn," grumbled old Moss. "I'll eat my hat-ry leg. See you in hell!"

When Mal stepped down from the veranda, he saw that the barnhouse was dark. But a dim light shone from the open doorway of the barn. He crossed the moonlit yard swiftly, hand close to gun butt. Just outside the barn door and to one side, he hesitated and peered in through narrowed eyes. The light came from a smoking lantern hanging from a beam by a wire. Mal realised that once he stepped into that doorway, he would be a perfect target, from both inside and out.

But danger or no danger, the wary outlaw hunter concluded he couldn't stand there all night. Perhaps, after all, Foxcock was on the level. Maybe he had left the light just for convenience, then hit the hay. Mal stepped swiftly through the doorway.

Something that felt like a sledge-hammer on a spine crashed against the side of his head. His brain reeled. Fire blazed behind his eyeballs. He fought to get his gun free, but his leaden fingers refused to close on the walnut grips. As he lurched around in falling, his phasing eyes caught a blurred glimpse of the malignant face of the giant Foxcock, lying stretched on a beam above the doorway. His hairy hand gripped an axe handle, clutched for another blow.

Wood figures were spinning in Mal's tortured brain. But one of them all escaped two. One was little Jeff McLeod. The other — a rounded girth figure topped by high-pitched coppery hair, and with a snell, bronze face that seemed all head eyes. A voice deep within whispered that no matter what the set-up was, little Mary Randall was riding on the brink of hell.

Another thought paled on that one, Mal himself, and he only, could save Mary. Then his lights went out.

He regarded his senses in a sort of pain. He was dimly conscious of a jolting sensation that sent shivers of agony from his head to his toes. Then he found he was lashed crosswise of the saddle on a pony that was straining up a steep mountain trail. The spicy odor of cedar and fir was heavy on his nostrils.

His thoughts flew to Mary Randall, wondering if she was safe. Then he thought once again of Little Jeff McLeod, and the rage of vengeance boiled in his veins. He wondered if he himself was to be killed with a slug in the back, an loyal Little Jeff had been. But his thoughts were cooled by the stopping of his horse.

The rope was cut between his hands and feet and he was dumped head-first on hard ground. He rolled over and tried to sit up, but fell from dizziness. From where he lay he saw a blanket jerked from the mouth of the cave, letting out a flood of yellow light that played over the early features of Grizzly Pocock lowering slowly.

Four men came down from the cave. In a moment Mal found himself lying stretched inside, with everybody gazing down at him. He calmly surveyed the circle.

One of the outlaws was a big back-toothed man with a black patch where his left eye should have been. Another was a gangling beanpole of a man with a fixed crafty leer. Further away stood a sawney youngster with ruthless hands and heavy boots-maddened eyes. But it was the leader, called by the others "Cuchillo", who caught Archer's attention.

He was an undecorated little fellow with mechanics' spite eyes, as bald as a doorknob. The left corner of his mouth was twisted in a permanent grin. When he spoke, it sounded like the spurring of a shifter with sand. He pointed toward the torn flesh and clotted blood on the side of the prisoner's head and face.

"You naughty man overplayed your hand, Grizzly," he rasped. "I want this prisoner kept alive. Soon as we get back from making this raid on old Goodnight's beef tonight, I aim to make this pedicel write a letter to Santa Fe telling his boss everything's gone. Once a week he can do that. That way, the Cockeyed Association won't be sending a man down here every so often to be gut-shot like I done that Jeff McLeod."

Mal Archer felt his blood go surging to his throbbing head. A picture of his murdered middle-aged father flitted across his memory. And there, not 10 feet distant, stood the wiry little rat who had planted the slug in Little Jeff's back. Cold rage chilled him. His steady grey eyes flashed like dagger points at the spite eyes of the grinning little outlaw.

"You dirty little yellow-bellied bush-whacker," he said distinctly. "You're well named - 'Cuchillo' - the knife. I will kill you, if it's the last job I do on earth!"

The devil called "Cuchillo" bowed slapping yellow teeth in a savage snarl. "You got good guts, lawman," he rasped. "But I been killing your kind so long it ain't even a chore." He swung around.

"Pocock," he sneered. "Did you shove them horses of Goodnight's over toward Chazy Man Creek, like I said, where they'll be easy to get at?"

"Shove 'em, horse," growled Grizzly, "and drifted them this way."

"We got to get a move on," sniped Cuchillo. He motioned to the others. "You there, Randall and Patch, tie that polecat up so he can't wiggle. We got nobody to spare to stay and guard him. I'll be ready in five minutes. You be ready to move!"

The sawney little leader ducked outside, followed by Pocock and the beanpole.

"See-o!" thought Mal. "The young boots-bound in Lacey Randall - Mary's kid brother." He noticed the sawney youngster avoided his eyes.

The two made fast the lashings on Mal's ankles and wrists and stretched him out between opposite bunk supports till his long body was as taut as a fiddle string, then turned out. A few minutes later came the dying rattle of flying boots.

In half an hour Archer was free. That was nearly routine stuff for him. It had been routine ever since he nearly lost his life by being left tied in this way on Boxer Sank.

Nobody ever noticed anything different about the boots Archer wore. But they were different. They were built to order with stiff, heavy homelike collars three inches wide stitched under the ankles. No matter how tightly his ankles were bound, he could free himself by gradually working his feet out of his boots. It was painful, but it worked.

Once his feet were free, he found a sharp edge on a bunk rail and began sawing on his wrist lashings. He was puzzled to find that the hoggin' strings had been tied so loosely they fell almost fell off.

He took precious time to search the cave, but failed to find a gun of any kind. On the far side of the little meadow in front, he discovered a pole corral holding three mustangs. Expertly fastening a lariat around from a piece of the rope he had been tied with, he mounted back on a stocky bay gelding and shot through the cut leading toward the northeast, where lay Big Coulee and Chazy Man.

He rode like a maniac for Big Coulee, hurrying the mount bay neck-deep down out of the dark foothills. Two images kept flitting across his mind - the frocked face of Little Jeff McLeod, and the malicious eyes of the devil called "Cuchillo", the fiend who had boasted of having shot Little Jeff in the back.

The idea of riding to the Looming G for help never even occurred to the racing outlaw hunter. One thought alone bogged in his aching head now - to get his steady fingers on Cuchillo's sawney throat. He had no gun, not even a saddle. But as he spooked the bay he planned.

He could strike big Coulee just about the time the rattled head emerged from the dry bed of the Chazy Man. He had a hunch Cuchillo would be bringing up the drag - staying back where trouble would be most likely to occur. And that's exactly the way it was.

Mal was charging down the south slope of Big Coulee when he saw the leaders of a herd of big stags come straggling down the north slope. A human beanpole was riding point.

Mal struck him like an avalanche, horse and all. The hoister went sprawling from his saddle, his head striking a dull thump! His stags flew from his holster and exploded when it struck. Archer pounced on it and hair-pinned into the saddle of Beanpole's hacktail.

The two sides on the right flank swerved and were spurring up the slope toward a pinon thicket, firing over their shoulders as they rode. The lone rider on the left flank cut straight through the herd and dashed up the slope after them, his carbine cracking. But, to his astonishment, Mal saw clearly by the direction of the carbine flame that the lone rider was firing at his companions! And he knocked them both from their saddles. Then he himself pitched over his horse's head.

Mal wheeled. The rider who had been bringing up the drag whipped around the edge of the herd in a dark blur that spat lead. A slug burned past Archer's ribs. Another nicked an ear. His own six-gun roared. The outlet leader grabbed wildly for the middle horn, missed it, and parted company with his mount. Now, as long as he lived, would Mal Archer forget the sight of that unknown figure hurtling through the moonlight, to land with a sickening crunch in a pile of stones. Mal turned his head and covered his eyes with his hand. His throat felt as if someone had drunk a washbasin full around it.

That hurtling figure was clothed in a woman's riding habit.

Mal couldn't clasp his hand tight enough to shut out the vision that was seething in his brain—a vision of a slim girl with gleaming copper hair and eyes like still pools beneath moonlit willows. The moon that came sailing through his clenched teeth helped to cover the pounding of approaching hoofbeats.

Mal jerked his head away. He was surrounded by breathless riders on horses flecked with foam. He saw old Moss Goodnight drop clumsily from the saddle beside the crumpled figure on the scoldie, then stagger as though he'd been stung by a yellow-jacket.

"I'll be a lucky-legged of tumble-bug!" exploded the older. "Looksee here!"

Mal was dumb, and though his legs felt like rubber he was the first to reach the limp body old Moss had turned face up.

"Crawley!" repeated Mal. "Who?" started old Moss.

"Crawley!" repeated Mal. "Boss John of the Bullpene Meadows peak of curly whiskers?"

"Crawley—my grandmother!" snorted old Moss derisively. "That's Tom Padway!"

Mal felt a tiny hand work its way into his. He glanced down. The large eyes of Mary Randall were pools of wild light.

A grapple-eyed fat man waddled up beside old Moss. "When Mary came to me," he muttered, "and spilled the tinplate, just before she and I rode out to your place tonight, Moss, I just couldn't believe Padway had been pulling the wool over my eyes for 20 years." He stooped and peered down into Padway's bruised face. "That's Tom Padway," he muttered. "But sure as my mother's 'Duke Crawley' I'll never believe it."

Mary's tiny fingers tightened around one of Mal's. "Padway forced me to point you out, Mal," she said with a catch in her voice, "by threatening to have Larry bang for the murder of Jeff McLeod. Then, after I'd done it, I knew I couldn't do such a thing to you, not even to save Larry from a hang-nose. So I told 'Uncle Crow' and he darted out to the larning G to try to head you off."

"Such as I got wind of all that," cut in old Moss, "I creaked me some skink close to home and went lookin' for Grizzly Peacock. When I couldn't locate him nor hear of him, we all started bull-bang for Bullpene Meadows. That's how we come to be crossin' the gulches when the fire-works started."

"Little Jeff McLeod was the best friend I ever had, Mary," Mal said quietly. "Larry didn't kill him. That lump of buttard back tying that badwrecked Little Jeff. He boasted of it."

"Mary gave a glad little cry, then instantly sobbed. "Mal," she whispered brokenly, "did—did—?"

"You all stand hitched a minute," Mal told them.

He wobbled across the gulches and knelt down in the shadow of a bunch bush. Larry Randall looked up at him with focused eyes.

"You Mal Archer?" he asked weakly.

"Yes, amigo," Crooked. "He rode off to the hideout this evening," the youngster went on, "trying to get me away and wanting the riding habit and side saddle I stole from her when Padway craved a good disguise and cut off my whisky money till I kicked in."

"She said you were her man," I laughed that off with my face—but not in my heart. That's how come I tied your wrists on moss. When the shooting started, I figured it must be you, so I done what I was able." His head fell back limply over Mal's arm.

Archer climbed the slope and made sure Grizzly Peacock and "Patch" were dead. Then he rejoined the others and had young Larry Randall's body gently on the ground.

"Mebbe it's better this way," he muttered. "But if Larry hadn't aided me in this fight tonight, I'd be where he is."

Mary was going down wide-eyed on her brother. Mal swung on Crowley. "One thing's puzzling me some, Crawley," he said. "Mosko Spear's dying words was—'He was damn lightnin'! Crawley! How do you account for that?'"

Duke Crowley's jaws quivered. "I was forever paying that tramp," he admitted, "telling him that on the draw he was slower'n a cow pulling her foot out of a bog. Redden it pruned on his mind."

But Mary Randall had had enough. She reeled against big Mal Archer's shoulder. He picked her up, stepped into the saddle, and with Mary cradled gently in his arms headed for the Larning G.

RIDDLE OF THE SEA

A popular one was that the serpent was really a long tubular piece of floating seaweed. The great naturalist Sir Richard Owen declared that Captain McQuhrie had really seen a very large seal or sea lion. Captain McQuhrie wrote an indignant reply to this, which also appeared in The Times.

It is hard to escape the conclusion that Captain McQuhrie and his crew really did see some monster unknown to science. It is difficult to credit a length of seaweed with a surface speed of 12 to 15 miles an hour, and a seal approaching a length of 60 feet — McQuhrie's estimated minimum — would be a genuine monster itself.

There can be no doubt that the crew of the Dreadnaught saw something, at any rate. Captains of the Royal Navy have never been in the habit of telling fairy stories to the Admiralty.

There are other cases where the monster in question showed itself to large numbers of witnesses. An instance like this occurred on the coast of Massachusetts in the north-east of the United States in 1817. It was seen over a period of several weeks by scores of people independently, including lawyers, fishermen, ministers, sea-captains, merchants, tradesmen and customs officers.

A committee set up by the Linnæan Society of New England interviewed as many of these people as they could find, presenting them with a well-thought-out questionnaire on what they had seen. All agreed on the main features of the creature they claimed to have seen.

It looked like a large snake, with smooth, almost black skin, and a whitish belly. It showed 40 or 50 feet of its length on the surface and must have been about 65 feet long overall. The visible part of its body was about a foot in diameter, and it always held its head up to a foot out of the water.

Some of the witnesses said it appeared to undulate vertically, unlike an ordinary snake which swims by swaying its body from side to side. They claimed that it could move at a speed of at least 20 to 30 knots — as fast as most whales. When it dived it went down suddenly, like a stone.

Once it appeared in Gloucester Roads, and four armed boats were sent to chase it. Matthew Giffney, a ship's carpenter, fired at it with an 18-bore musket, and believed he hit it in the head. The serpent turned and dived at once, then reappeared 100 yards away and swam off.

The witnesses agreed that as a rule the serpent did not seem to take much notice of boats. It was more in the least aggressive. They believed that it fed on small fish like herrings, and was harmless to humans.

Harmless or not, sea-serpents have frequently had to face worse than a man with a pistol. In July, 1897, Lieutenant Lagardie, the commander of the French gunboat Avanache on the coast of Indo-China (now Vietnam), encountered two bulky, undulating monsters about 45 feet long. They dived and vanished when the Avanache fired a gun.

The following February the Avanache met some similar monsters. Lieutenant Lagardie opened fire on them with a quick-firer at a range of about 400 yards, and also tried to ram one of them. This monster was faster than the gunboat and eventually escaped, although Lagardie succeeded in driving it into the shallows several times.

Lieutenant Lagardie was not the only one to engage a sea-serpent in a naval action. On July 30, 1915, the German submarine U28 torpedoed the British steamer Scorpan in the North Atlantic. U28 surfaced, and her commander, Frothing Georg Quastler von Fomberg, and the officers of the watch were on the conning tower to observe the doomed ship's last moments.

About half a minute after the Scorpan's bows went under there was a violent explosion, and a gigantic sea-creature was blown out of the water along with fragments of wreckage. It was shaped like a crocodile with four webbed feet, and looked about 60 feet long.

Even less fortunate was another 60-footer, this time with a long neck, which was sighted off Iceland in 1917 by the armed merchant cruiser HMS Hilary. Captain F. W. Dean decided to use it as a target for gunnery practice with the Hilary's three anti-aircrafts.

The monster was hit on the third salvo, and thrashed an apparent agony for a few seconds before sinking. Hilary was served a few days later, when a U boat torpedoed and sank the Hilary.

The Loch Ness Monster has all the characteristics of a sea-serpent, but it is hard to claim it as one since it lives far inland in fresh water. However, there is a similar case of a salt-water monster appearing to members of people over a period of several decades in one particular locality.

This monster was seen on the west coast of Canada in 1932, in the straits between the city of Vancouver and Vancouver Island. Witnesses said it appeared to be about 80 ft long, and shaped more like a lizard than a snake. About 100 people reported seeing it, including three ship's captains and an aviator pilot.

The local newspaper christened the monster "codbonesaur", from the nearby town of Cadboro. It was feared that the Chinook Indians of the area had apparently known of the monster for centuries, calling it Ashchekalack.

The codbonesaur, or another of its tribe, was reported in the same area after World War II. Judge James Thomas Brown, President of the King's Bench of Saskatchewan, saw it again in 1950.

Sometimes sea-serpents even enter the orbits of heads of state. On June 1, 1877 a sea-monster with large turtle-like flippers and a head shaped like a snail's was seen off the north coast of Sicily by HMS Osborne, Queen Victoria's royal yacht. It measured about 50 feet from the crown of its head to the shoulder behind the flippers, and appeared to have a row of fins down its back.

Four of the Osborne's officers saw it — but not the Queen, which was a pity. She would probably have made a good witness. However, her grandson, the Duke of Clarence, later King George V, was looking. He sighted one from HMS Bacchante four years later when he was a midshipman on a training cruise.

Another monster has been reported from time to time near San Clemente, California — recently famous as the site of President Nixon's "summer White House". It has a thick 10-foot neck and gives the appearance of having a massive body under the water.

Believers in sea-serpents come in two varieties: those who simply believe it is likely that there are some kinds of huge sea-creatures still unknown to science, and those who have detained themselves to explain what exactly the creatures are. Scottish opponents of sea-serpents, however, believe that all sea-serpent reports can be explained away as faulty observation or hoaxes.

One favorite argument against the existence of sea-serpents is the fact that no authentic sea-serpent remains have yet been identified by scientists. Huge carcasses of missing forms have been found from time to time, but all of them have turned out to be ribbon fish, basking sharks or whales.

In the autumn of 1888, British scientists thought that they had the real McCoy for the first time. A snake-like body 35 feet long was found cut up on the island of Stromø in the Orkneys. Witnesses described it as having six limbs, a small head on a very long neck and a long winding tail like a lizard's. A narrow hairy crust ran along its spine to the end of its tail.

The Scottish islanders were thorough in their examination of the rotting remains. Besides measuring it, they cut open its stomach and looked inside, and removed various parts of it — the skull, a limb and part of the spinal column — before the carcass broke up in a storm. These remains were forwarded to the Edinburgh Natural History Society.

The members of the Society supposed that they had solved the riddle of the sea-serpent's identity. But Edward Home, a London surgeon and naturalist, identified the remains from their description as those of a huge basking shark, a whale-sized monster feeding on plankton. Home pointed out that the "Stromø beast's" bones were flexible like a shark's, not hard and rigid like those of a fish or a reptile. The six limbs were really six four-belly fins and the double reproductive organs. Decomposition made it appear to be long and thin.

Basking shark remains have been the long-term favorites for mistaken identifications of sea-serpents. This is mainly due to the spread of a popular theory which argues that sea-serpents do exist, and are survivors of the prehistoric plesiosaurs, a form of giant marine reptile with a smooth-skinned, turtle-shaped body and a very long neck, extinct for 70 million years.

Plesiosaurs looked nothing like a basking shark. But when a basking shark dies and its body rots, at an early stage its huge lower jaw and gills come away. This leaves a tiny skull at the end of a long spinal column which looks like a thin neck. All the plesiosaurs-like remains so far have turned out to be sharks in this condition.

But this cannot be taken as proof that real plesiosaurs don't still exist. The Doodlakine sea-serpent might have been one with its body submerged so might the one which was sunk by HMS Hillyar. So might the "codfish-creature".

Another popular theory is that sea-serpents are really just gigantic eels. This is supported by solid evidence, too. In 1930, scientists on an expedition in the South Atlantic dredged up an eel 14½ feet long. The adult stage of such an eel could measure over 100 feet. This could also account for the Doodlakine monster, seen at the same waters.

There are other theories which advance the cases for giant eels, giant long-necked animals like snakes and giant squids seen from unusual angles. Dr Edmund Howellsman, probably the greatest living authority on sea-serpent lore, has grouped all the available honest descriptions into nine categories, each one a creature of a different form — long-necked, many-tapped, manlike, many-finned, super-reptile, super-eel, giant turtle, giant crocodile and yellow-belly.

Dr Howellsman regards the existence of the giant turtle and yellow-belly as doubtful. He believes that the super-eel — possibly what the Doodlakine sighted — is a fish, the giant crocodile (as interpreted by U28) a reptile with fins, and the last five in the list are all mammals. He has suggested that the long-necked kind is really a giant type of seal with a shape resembling a ballfish pincorner, and that the other four are possible survivors of prehistoric whales. Dr Howellsman has gone so far as to assign provisional scientific Latin names to several of them.

Dr Howellsman is trying to correct the approach of a previous sea-serpent expert, Dr A. C. Outerman, who declared that there was only one kind of unknown monster — a gigantic long-necked snake-like animal, which he christened Atropophis. Dr Outerman decided that all genuine sea-serpent sightings referred to this animal, and those which differed were the result of inaccurate observation.

Whether or not you choose to go along with the useful of submarine parts proposed by Dr Outerman, it is a known fact that there are huge sea-creatures of a less controversial form which have not yet been fully described by scientists. Dr Edward Wilson, who perished with Captain Scott on his journey back from the South Pole in 1912, saw an unknown kind of huge whale with a very high, narrow dorsal fin when he was in the Antarctic in 1902. No carcass of this whale has yet been described. Some kinds of large beaked whale have been sighted but never killed.

The worst evidence for the existence of these whales is a lot scarier than that for the sea-serpent. But nobody has bothered to cast doubt on the whale's reality. There is no need to be dogmatic about the precise identity of sea-serpents on the evidence available, but it is surely only fair to accept the word of at least some of the people who have reported them.

Dr Howellsman could well be right when he suggests that there is more than one kind of unknown monster. The descriptions vary too much for a single creature to fulfil them all. Of course, some might be imaginary. But not all of them.

There is still plenty of room for monsters in the world's oceans. Merchant ships have stuck to well-defined shipping lanes in the ocean age, and there are vast areas of sea which nowadays are seldom crossed by a boat. And men have hardly begun yet to explore properly in the shadowy depths beyond the continental shelves. When they do they sometimes dredge up a fish like the coelacanth, discovered 30 years ago after being known only as a fossil 70 million years old.

There are hundreds of reports of sightings to go through, and you can form any number of theories. You can believe in eels, seals, plesiosaurs, or whatever you like. When all the evidence is weighed — even just the cream of it, from the best witnesses — there's too much to ignore. They can't all be wrong. There must be something out there.
